Mr. Harn's graphic statement was made during an interview this week in which he discussed the evident trend towards co-operative advertising, a movement in which he has been interested since the National Save-the-Surface Campaign was started some six years ago. In addition to the advantages which, he said, resulted when competing manufacturers get together to promote a general advertising campaign, he sketched the pitfalls to avoid, and one of them was, in his own phrase, promiscuous press agentry.

Mr. Harn listed his oppositions to free publicity.

"I am very much opposed to free publicity," he began. "I don't believe it is a good thing for either the publication or the manufacturer, because generally the work of a press agent is of inferior editorial value and fails in reader interest.

"It is bad for the manufacturer, because he obtains his best hold on the public by telling his own story in his own way, paying for space, and placing his copy in those media, which have the confidence of the people.

"As an advertiser I only want to use those media which are strong editorially, which have, in other words, real reader confidence. As a reader, I find I can detect free publicity at a glance.

"I am a strong believer in the power of straight-forward advertising over the name of the manufacturer for whom the copy is written. A manufacturer doesn't have to slip over his message in the guise of news. Advertising has a very strong appeal and the best way to get results is to pay your way."

As an example of the futility of press agentry and the success which followed purchase of paid space in the newspapers, Mr. Harn cited the case of traction trouble in Cleveland. The traction interests were giving out their side of the tangle through public relations experts. In the news columns, Mr. Harn said, the issues became confused. Then the companies resorted to paid advertisements. A distinct difference in the public attitude followed.

Mr. Harn has good reason behind his belief in paid space. Just after the war, from an idea originated and nurtured into being by Earnest T. Trigg, of Philadelphia, the paint and varnish manufacturers of America raised $100,000 for a general co-operative advertising campaign by informal voluntary subscriptions. This was the beginning of the National Save-the-Surface Campaign.

Five years ago defenders of the campaign made the boast that the business of the manufacturers participating would be doubled by 1926.

"We did it in less than five years," Mr. Harn said this week. "And much of the credit goes to the co-operative advertising.

"From the start it has never lessened the advertising activities of the individual companies taking part. Our endeavor was to make the public realize in a general way the value of protecting property by use of paint and varnish. No separate trade brands were boosted. All paint and varnish concerns could join in and most of them did.

"Since the beginning of the Save-the-Surface drive there has been a very strong trend towards similar co-operative enterprises. It amounts to a recognition on the part of a great many advertisers that some advertising promotion can be accomplished very successfully by an industry working as a unit."

The writer had the impression that the National Save-the-Surface Campaign had relied almost entirely on the purchase of space in the magazine and the promiscuous spreading of unasked for press agentry to tell the story in the newspapers, and Mr. Harn was questioned on that point. In reply he said a "tremendous amount" of paid advertising had been placed in newspapers by local painters as a result of the Save-the-Surface movement and declared the "educational bureau" of the campaign had been created in response to demands from outside, and not by the inside sponsors.

"After the campaign had been under way a short time," he explained, "a great many publications began to see there was considerable interest in redecorating by painting and varnishing. We began to receive requests from various publications for articles on the subject.

"We received so many such requests in fact that finally we created our educational bureau to supply the demand. This was three years ago. When the requests are for exclusive material, we make sure what we send out is exclusive. But, also, we have sent out many mats of articles on redecoration. These we have endeavored to make authoritative statements on the general subject. We have never introduced sales talks, advocating various trade brands, and we have never attempted to disguise the source of the articles."

Mr. Harn said it was true that the annual appropriation collected for the National Save-the-Surface Campaign, which amounted last year to about $250,000, was expended largely in the magazines, but he said local groups of painters and paint dealers had placed considerable business in their local newspapers as a result of missionary work carried on by the compaign committee.

"We have tried, and successfully, too, to arouse the interest of local paint organizations in advertising in their home newspapers," Mr. Harn said.

"We have impressed them with the advisability of taking the seasonal kink out of painting by persistent year-round newspaper advertising.

"As an example of results I need only point to the action which has taken place in Minneapolis and St. Paul promoted by the National Save-the-Surface Campaign. A local fund was raised to promote off-season painting. It has proved so successful, using newspapers, that last year other phases of industry were interested in the proposition and the advertising fund in this one city has been increased from $2,000 to $30,000 to promote year-round building and painting, hitherto considered impracticable."

General advertising of the National Save-the-Surface Campaign is financed by money obtained on a quota basis. The 300 member paint and varnish manufacturers contribute ⅛ per cent of their annual gross sales to the fund. The money so collected is turned in to a common treasury, and no one knows definitely how much the other pays. Administration of the appropriation thus obtained is in the hands of a committee made up of representatives of all phases of the industry. An executive office is maintained in Philadelphia, which is in charge of a salaried manager, Arthur East.

Mr. Harn is an old newspaper man, a graduate of the Cleveland Press. He started first as a reporter on the Cleveland Leader, immediately after he had received his degree from Cornell. Transferring to the Press, he became telegraph editor before leaving to engage in press association work, as editor of the Cleveland office of the Scripps-McRae wire service.

From this latter work, Mr. Harn went into trade journalism in Cleveland as editor and manager of a grocery paper. There he began writing advertisements for clients. One of the clients was the H. J. Heinz Company, of which he subsequently became advertising manager. He stayed with this concern a year, and in 1905 took a similar position with the National Lead Company, where he is now also chairman of the sales committee as well as advertising manager.

When Mr. Harn first took over his work with the National Lead Company it had no national trade mark. Its white lead brands only had local prestige. To make general advertising possible, Mr. Harn originated the "Dutch Boy Painter" as the company's trade mark.

As a reader, I find I can detect free publicity at a glance—O. C. Harn.

DRAKE ESTATE SCHEME EXPOSED

Des Moines Evening Tribune Attacks Claims of Local "Descendant"

The Des Moines Evening Tribune this week exposed the activities of Oscar M. Hartzell, former resident of that city but now in London, England, reputed to have obtained more than $200,000 from 1,200 Des Moines subscribers in the last five or six years in support of his alleged fight in England to obtain possession of the Sir Francis Drake estates. Hartzell claimed to have established the fact that the explorer left a son and that he, Hartzell, is a direct descendant of Drake and therefore entitled to the huge wealth that has accumulated.

The Tribune-News printed voluminous correspondence between the paper and the U. S. Embassy in London; the Burke Publishing Company of London, publishers of Burke's Peerage; the American Consular Service at London; and the British consulate general, all denying the authenticity of the Hartzell claims. A postal inspection has been started and some of the victims of the Hartzell fraud have instituted suits in the Polk courts alleging swindle.

DISCONTINUES SUNDAY EDITION

Des Moines Capital Transferring Features to Saturday Issue

The Des Moines (Ia.) Capital, evening newspaper, discontinued its Sunday edition with the issue of Feb. 21.

The 4-page comic section, in colors, the dramatic and society pages of the Sunday edition were transferred to the Saturday edition.

In announcing the suspension of the Sunday paper the Capital stated: that it has been unprofitable since it was started in April, 1919.

New presses with new stereotyping machinery costing more than $100,000 are being installed in the Daily Capital's mechanical departments.

Morning Publishers Advertising

The Morning Newspaper Publishers Association is launching an advertising campaign directed at agencies and national advertisers to stress the advantages of the morning newspaper field. A. Schaefer, of the Ft. Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette is president of the group. Emerson B. Knight, Inc., Indianapolis, is preparing and placing the copy.

SPACE GRAFTERS HANDED KNOCKOUT BY INLAND DAILY PRESS MEMBERS

Resolution Asking Publishers to Return All Free Publicity to Advertisers Adopted Unanimously at Chicago Meeting—Introduced by Huckle

ALL the resources of the Inland Daily Press Association were placed behind the drive against free space grafters at the annual meeting in Chicago last week with the adoption of a resolution calling upon members to return all free publicity received to the advertiser in whose interest it is sent.

The resolution, passed unanimously by the convention, was presented by T. O. Huckle, business manager of the Ypsilanti (Mich.) Daily Ypsilantian-Press, at the conclusion of a speech in which he emphasized the evils of free publicity.

The resolution as adopted follows:

"RESOLVED: That it be the sense of this convention that every member of the Inland Daily Press Association be urged to join in a concentrated movement to help kill the space grafters, who live almost entirely off of newspaper publishers, by the following intensive cooperation:

"First: Upon all free publicity received from space grafters (this term not applying to Red Cross, church, or worthy benevolent associations) place the Inland anti-free publicity rubber stamp. Members of the National Editorial Association should affix also the N. E. A. red sticker.

"Second: Prepare a circular or folder setting forth in brief paragraphs the publisher's viewpoint of the space grafter's unfairness to all concerned.

"Third: Place all of above with publisher's rate card in a large plain, envelope without postage and return it to the advertiser, or organization (not to the space grafter) who upon receiving requests from many points at once for stamps to cover postage due on letters, will awaken to the fact that publishers are no longer the fools space grafters represent them to be.

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED: That the Inland Secretary be asked to set this resolution in either bold face type or in a box in the next Inland Bulletin so that all members not present today may realize the seriousness of this concentrated effort."

Mr. Huckle in his speech preceding the introduction of the resolution said:

"Isn't it strange that so many concerns and organizations are generous to the 'dear public,' and expect that the newspapers should fall in with their ideas of publicity? At the outset, let me challenge any publisher here to name a single manufacturer who ever sent out one line of free publicity on behalf of the 'dear public' without first realizing in the final analysis that it is for his ultimate gain.

"No publisher can afford to sit back and say, 'What little I may run in my paper will do no harm and it really does help me out in a "pinch" sometimes.' Just as a few publishers by cutting advertising rates, hurt the whole profession, so does the running of the least bit of free publicity react unfavorably.

"Now when you have run these 'exclusive stories,' prepared at great expense by the space grafters—would it shock you to know that after you have published this so-called news in columns that are not for sale at any price the press agent takes out his rule and checks up every inch of it? He measures this the same as you do any local or national display account and then charges it up on his records for the various manufacturers or organizations at your one-time national rate.

"Would it interest you to know that these space grafters are now so numerous that they are actually selling free publicity space they get from weak-kneed publishers just as some weak-kneed publishers used to cut their advertising rates when national advertisers came to them direct to avoid agency and special representative commissions?

"I do not think that it is necessary for me to dwell further on the evils of free publicity. If any have not yet caught the intent of my remarks so far, they are beyond any publisher's help.

"Resolving to run no more free publicity, but to throw it in the waste-basket will not kill the octopus as long as there are some publishers who will continue to let it creep in.

"There is but one way, according to experts, to fight space grafters, and that is to return all material received to the advertiser direct—not to the space grafter.

"Right now, while publishers' trade journals, and EDITOR & PUBLISHER in particular, are doing such a fine work in helping us fight this evil of evils, is the time to take action and do something worthwhile and effective."

The resolution was then presented and passed unanimously.

DAILIES RE-ELECT SCHILPLIN

Northwest Group Holds Annual Convention in Minneapolis

Fred Schilplin, publisher of the St. Cloud Daily Times, and Fred La Fond, publisher of the Little Falls Daily Transcript, were re-elected president and secretary, respectively of the Northwest Daily Press Association which held its annual meeting in Minneapolis, Feb. 18. L. S. Whitcomb, Albert Lea Evening Tribune; Harry Hill, Fargo (N. D.) Forum, and Edward L. Ogilvie, South St. Paul Daily Reporter, constitute the new executive committee.

"Prosperity is not returning to the Northwest. It is here," said R. P. Palmer, advertising manager of the association, in an address. He based his assertion upon his report that advertising linage originating in the Twin Cities and carried by Northwestern dailies in 1925 was 200,000 lines more than for the previous year. Other speakers were R. R. Ring, general manager of the association, and S. C. Theis, advertising representative of Northwestern dailies in Chicago and New York.

Journal-Post Staff Frolics

Above is an unusual full-page advertisement which appeared in the classified columns of the Los Angeles Examiner, Sunday, Feb. 7. Column rules were left in and none but open face and agate type used. It advertised the sale of the bankrupt stock of automobiles of J. K. Fronk, known as the "Ponzi of Hollywood." R. E. Seiler, classified manager of the Examiner believes it to be the largest single classified advertisement that has ever appeared in a newspaper. There have been full page classified advertisements from one firm in other newspapers, but such advertisements have been made up of a number of advertisements and not just one, he states. This advertisement appeared only in the Los Angeles Examiner and resulted in 8,000 people attending the sale on Sunday alone and 15,000 attending the first three days, Mr. Seiler said.

CHICAGO PRESS PLANS $4,000,000 BUILDING

100 Men Will Be Asked to Buy $10,000 Founders' Bonds to Start Construction on 20-Story Building

Harry G. Fisher, president of the Chicago Press Club, has issued a brochure bearing the title "Chicago Press Club's Four Million Dollar Building Program."

The club has been renamed the Greater Chicago Press Club and a drive has been started to build a 20-story building, several floors of which will be given over to the club proper.

The club's plan of financing, as set forth in the brochure, is "to invite 100 men of standing to purchase a bond for $10,000 bearing 6 per cent interest (on the plan of cumulative preferred shares) to be known as a Founder's Bond." The bonds, in addition to bearing interest, entitles the holder to an associate membership, barred from holding office. If the $10,000 bond series does not result in $1,000,000, the club plans to issue a second series of $1,000 bonds, the holders to be entitled to certain public club privileges.

The booklet describes the membership plans as follows: "A committee formed of the managing editors of all local dailies, along with the local superintendents of the Associated Press and the United Press (or their appointed proxies) will pass upon the qualifications for membership; secondly, a committee formed of the business managers of the Chicago papers (or their proxies) shall have entire charge of the finances of the club and shall O. K. or veto all expenditures of the club above $500."

Weeklies Plan Chicago Ad Office

W. C. Jarnagin, formerly managing editor of the Des Moines (Ia.) Capital and now publisher of the Storm Lake (Ia.) Pilot-Tribune, weekly, and Justin Barry, publisher of the Cherokee (Ia.) Times are forming an organization of Iowa weekly publishers for the purpose of employing an advertising solicitor to sell the Iowa weekly field. The representative's office will be in Chicago.

Sherman Joins Lanston Company

The Lanston Monotype Machine Company of Philadelphia announces that after March 1, Frank M. Sherman will be its director of advertising and publicity. On that date Mr. Sherman closes his office in Chicago, where for two years he has been operating an advertising agency under his own name, and will move to Philadelphia.

A.N.A. Sets Convention Date

The semi-annual convention of the Association of National Advertisers will be held May 10 to 12, at the Edgewater Beach Hotel, Chicago, it was announced this week by Robert K. Leavitt, association secretary.

HARVARD AWARDS PRESENTED AT DINNER

Winners Feted at New York Advertising Club—E. E. Calkins Given Gold Medal—Mrs. Proetz Twice Honored—Pedlar & Ryan, Joseph Richards, Young & Rubicam, and W. D. Humphrey Win

FORMAL presentation of the 1925 Harvard Advertising awards, founded in 1923 by Edward W. Bok, was made by Dean W. B. Donham of the Harvard School of Business Administration at a dinner in honor of the winners held at the Advertising Club of New York, Feb. 24.

As summoned to receive their prizes the winners were:

Ernest Elmo Calkins, president, Calkins & Holden, Inc., New York, awarded gold medal for "distinguished personal service to advertising."

Ernest Elmo Calkins

Young & Rubicam, Philadelphia, for the Postum Cereal advertising campaign, considered "most conspicuous for the excellence of its planning and execution," awarded $2,000 cash prize and certificate.

Joseph Richards Company, Inc., New York, for the Tide Water Oil Sales Corporation's "Tydol" campaign, deemed "the most excellent local campaign of a manufacturer, awarded $2,000 and a certificate.

Pedlar & Ryan, Inc., New York, for the retail store campaign for Ovington's store, New York, awarded $2,000 and a certificate.

Merle Thorpe, of Nation's Business, Washington, for an advertisement in his publication deemed "most effective in the use of text," awarded $1,000 and a certificate.

Willard D. Humphrey, of McKinney, Marsh & Cushing, Inc., Detroit, for the advertisement most effective in the use of pictorial illustration, awarded $1,000 and a certificate.

Mrs. Erma Perham Proetz, of the Gardner Advertising Company, St. Louis, for the advertisement most effective in the combination of both pictorial illustration and text, awarded $1,000 and a certificate.

H. G. Weaver of the General Motors Corporation for the most conspicuous research, $2,000 and a certificate.

Speakers at the dinner were Bruce Barton, of Barton, Durstine & Osborne, New York, representing the jurors · Mrs. Proetz, Prof. G. B. Hotchkiss, New York University, and Mr. Calkins.

Mr. Calkins declared his award possibly typified the progress made in advertising during the past 25 years. He said he could not claim all the tribute, but must pass it along to his associates who had made his success possible. In closing he expressed the hope that a Harvard Award would eventually be created for presentation to a "super copy-writer."

Prof. Hotchkiss asserted that advertising could not yet be classed as a profession. As yet, he said, its standards of eligibility were not strict enough, there was rather a spirit of competitive jealousy than co-operation and friendly rivalry, a tendency to guard "secret knowledge" instead of sharing in knowledge and adding to the general store, and insufficient interest in the development of courses of education looking towards preparation for advertising work.

In making the medal award to Mr. Calkins the jury said: "Although handicapped by an incurable deafness, his vivid personality and fine intellect have been a constant inspiration in upholding the highest ideals of the advertising fraternity, and for this service he has been chosen by an unanimous jury as the recipient of the gold medal for the year 1925. As a partner in the firm of Calkins & Holden, Inc., since its inception in 1902, he has long been a leader in establishing advertising agency practice. Calkins and Holden early became recognized as the type of new agency that was entirely to displace the old. The first complete plan for an advertising campaign, in typewritten outline, illustrated with exhibits, was evolved in the offices of this firm, and was such a novelty that it was worn out through being borrowed and shown to advertisers by representatives of newspapers and magazines. The first attempt to merchandise advertising campaigns to salesmen and dealers also was made by Calkins and Holden.

"Mr. Calkins early realized that art and typography must play an important part in advertising. Trained as a printer, he also studied art to prepare himself to utilize the vast resources of art in selling messages. He helped to organize the first art department in any agency. The art department of Calkins and Holden has for years been the training school for advertising art directors. Mr. Calkins also introduced the typographer to the agency's staff, and a special typographical department was created.

"In 1908 the first exhibition of advertising art was held at the National Arts Club, suggested and planned by Mr. Calkins, and was the precursor of the exhibitions now held annually by the Art Directors' Club.

"The first book describing the working of the new type of advertising agency, and the relations of client, agent and medium, was 'Modern Advertising,' written by Mr. Calkins jointly with his partner, Ralph Holden. Mr. Calkins also has written for the Atlantic Monthly, Scribner's and other magazines, and is a contributing editor of Advertising and Selling Fortnightly. He was given the honorary degree of doctor of literature from Knox College in recognition of his work in the field of advertising."

Mrs. Proetz, twice winner of a Harvard award, was graduated from Washington University, St. Louis, in 1913. She came to New York some time later and joined the editorial staff of the Dry Goods Economist, remaining for several years. She joined the Gardner Agency, St. Louis, two and a half years ago, assisting in the servicing of Pet Milk copy. A little more than a year ago she was placed in charge of this account.

The copy which won the prize for Mrs. Proetz was a full page in the Ladies Home Journal. Described as "a very feminine advertisement" by Mrs. Proetz, it showed the single figure of a woman holding up a portion of meat. The caption read "Cooked In Milk."

In 1924, Mrs. Proetz received $1,000 for the advertisement most effective in use of pictorial illustration.

General Motors Corporation advertising, in addition to Pet Milk, won a prize for the second consecutive year. To H. G. Weaver of the General Motors Corporation was awarded $2,000 in cash and a certificate for the most conspicuous research, the purpose of which was to bring about economy or obtain efficiency in advertising by producing information of general value in furthering the knowledge and science of advertising. This was for a research which developed an index of effective buying power for consumers by counties in the United States.

Mrs. Erma P. Proetz

This was the only award made for research in 1925, whereas two were made in 1924, one of $1,500 to J. Walter Thompson Company, New York, for investigation into and analysis of subscription circulation of 44 general magazines in metropolitan Cincinnati by various groupings, and the second to Barton, Durstine & Osborn, Inc., for a field survey report for the American Radiator Company.

The Postum Campaign of Young & Rubicam was written for a product that had been on the market for over 30 years and had been powerfully advertised from the beginning, agency officials stated. Postum was universally known, and has been tried, at one time or another, in the majority of homes.

In order to obtain a substantial increase in Postum business, it appeared necessary to create a new interest in the product, and a new prestige for it. This was accomplished by:

1. Continuing the old negative appeal against coffee that had been largely responsible for the Postum business already built, but presenting it in a more skillful way.
2. Stressing the positive values of Postum—its distinctive flavor, the wholesome materials of which it is made, its convenience and its economy.
3. Presenting a new way of preparing Instant Postum with hot milk, that makes it an ideal drink for children.
4. Making Postum advertising sufficiently constructive to be accepable to publications of the highest grade—thereby bringing the product into the best company.
5. Using beautiful pictures and fine typography for the prestige and interest that such associations give.
6. Telling the whole Postum story, quietly and convincingly, in an effort to sell the product to a few people, rather than to flash a showy but inadequate publicity message before the eyes of many.
7. Preparing what amounted to seven distinct campaigns, in an effort to come as close as possible to each type or class of prospects. These campaigns were different in both text and illustrations. One was directed to men, through magazines read largely by men; one to women and mothers, through their own magazines; one to older children and one to young children, in magazines reaching the two age groups; one to teachers, one to physicians, and one to nurses, in their professional media.

In addition, two supplementary newspaper campaigns were run during the year in territories where the salesmen were having difficulty in maintaining their quotas.

"In the marketing of gasoline, substitution is an evil that has grown to alarming proportions, especially in New York City," R. M. Newcomb of the Joseph Richards Company stated in describing the prize-winning Tydol campaign.

"An investigation made by the Tide Water Oil Sales Corporation indicated that in some cases 70 per cent of the gasoline being sold from a Tydol pump was not Tydol at all. Car owners were paying the full market price for what they supposed to be Tydol, and were receiving instead an inferior substitute.

"Tide Water had two courses of action—either to withdraw entirely from the rich New York market, or devise a new and effective way of stamping out substitution. It was finally decided to seal the Tydol pumps in such a way that only genuine Tydol could be sold from them, and to advertise the fact in the New York newspapers.

"The first advertisement of the campaign was a double spread in every important newspaper in New York. It created a sensation. Within 24 hours practically every big legitimate competitor of the Tide Water had endorsed Tide Water's stand.

"At the close of the campaign a checkup was made, and it was found that the advertising had

1. Reduced substitution of inferior gasolines for Tydol to an absolute minimum.
2. Introduced a new and accurate way of checking Tydol dealers.
3. Cemented the relationship between Tydol dealers and Tide Water.
4. Increased the number of Tydol dealers by 10 per cent and had materially increased sales.

"The campaign ran from Oct. 8 to Nov. 21 in 6 New York City newspapers. It consisted of one double spread; 4 full pages; 5 half pages; one 1,050 line and three 600 line advertisements."

Sophistication of copy and art work was the motif of the Ovington campaign which won for Pedlar & Ryan, New York agency, the Harvard award for the most notable local campaign for the excellence of planning and execution.

Thomas Ryan

Describing the copy Mr. Ryan said:

"In my letter that accompanied the campaign, we pointed out the following points: We rather feel that Ovington's is a shop with a tremendous variety of merchandise and to reflect this shop truly the aim of the advertising has always been to present a new facet with each piece of copy, to show a great variety, not of merchandise alone, but of copy, art treatment and size of space.

"Approximately 50 artists worked on the campaign. There were several hundred individual pieces in it. The background of the campaign is newspapers and in each of 12 papers we use an average of 200 insertions a year.

"The Ovington campaign has always been for the sophistication of its copy and its art work as well. This has been deliberate. We believe that the curse of too many advertisements is the perpetual 'we want to sell something' on the part of the merchant, and by an indirection, Ovington's have assumed that people want to buy there and have begun their advertising from that point.

"This doesn't mean that the selling element has been out of the copy. Approximately 90 per cent of the advertising is direct merchandise. About 10 per cent of it is given in a humorous treatment. But that 10 per cent of the advertising entirely leavens the whole campaign.

"One of the beliefs back of it is that it is necessary to pay the reader in interest for his having read your advertisement. By doing that he will read a great many more of them and the success of Ovington's store is a pretty good proof that if a person reads 100 Ovington advertisements in a year we are quite apt to get some business out of it."

Describing his prize-winning Hays glove advertisement, which was judged the best in use of pictorial illustration, J. D. Humphrey of McKinney, Marsh & Cushing, Inc., Detroit, said:

"What we tried to achieve in the series of Daniel Hays glove advertisements was a treatment that would first of all be 'different,' truly and objective that is much easier stated than accomplished. The woodcut motif was arrived at by process of elimination and settled upon after much discussion and experiment. A study of previous advertising done by Daniel Hays and a review of all competitive material did not reveal anything except that there were established and almost standard methods of picturing gloves. A glove, like the part of the anatomy it covers, is a most difficult object to portray in any manner except the inanimate.

"In nearly all glove advertising the product is shown laid flat, very delicately retouched, arranged to show a back with embroidery and a palm with the branded button. All these illustrations looked alike except for the button and they all had an appearance that made the word embalmed a common and very descriptive adjective. In the progress of our work another standard practice to portray quality was to employ very skillfully lighted photographs using silks or tapestries for a background. The third method provided the atmosphere of quality by canes, top hats, bridal reins, and the famous burning cigarette on the table edge with glove in juxtaposition. Fortunately we had time to be dissatisfied with our first ideas and sketches.

"Our first rough sketches in search for a theme idea produced a full variety of the above treatment. The woodcut was a technique that would permit a transcription of a well-lighted photograph and at the same time would be entirely different than the common tendency toward photographs. It enabled us to emphasize the product beyond what a specially lighted photograph could produce. Then, too, some very old established firms including Daniel Hays still have woodcut reproductions upon their product package. The very appearance of such packages recalls the days of pioneer merchants and imparts something of the integrity of old established firms. The idea was in perfect harmony with the client's slogan which we would use in any event, 'Gloves since 1854' and so our publication campaign came about in this day when all publications carry so much good looking advertising matter obviously the output of professional production, mere nicety of display will not gain attention."

Mr. Humphrey added that distinction is the quality most needed in advertisements, saying that many small store amateur writers are getting more returns per dollar on crude copy, which at least attracts attention.

"Maybe some of us professionals could afford to be not so darned professional," he concluded. "The cost of opening up a sales market is rapidly growing no cheaper."

Members of the jury were: Ex-Governor Henry J. Allen, of Kansas, and publisher of the Wichita Beacon; Bruce Barton, of Barton, Durstine & Osborn, Inc., advertising agency, New York; Neil H. Borden, assistant professor of advertising in the Harvard School of Business Administration; Dr. M. T. Copeland, professor of marketing in the same school; Mac Martin, president of the Mac Martin Advertising Agency, Minneapolis; Malcolm Muir, vice-president and chairman of the sales board of the McGraw-Hill Company, publishers, New York; Stanley Resor, president of the J. Walter Thompson Company, advertising agency, New York; Tim Thrift, advertising manager of the American Multigraph Sales Company, Cleveland, and C. K. Woodbridge, president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, and president of the Dictaphone Corporation, New York.

Seven certificates and cash awards totaling $11,000 and a gold medal were awarded for the past year against nine cash awards totaling $12,000 and a gold medal for 1924. Members of the jury of award, nine prominent publishers, advertising men and Harvard professors, met at the Harvard School of Business Administration last month and considered the advertisements entered in the competition, announcement of their decision being reserved until now. Material was submitted from all parts of the country, representing a wide field.

The jury has made recommendations for several minor changes in the awards for 1926, according to Dean Donham, the most important of which are the inclusion of an award for the advertising campaign of industrial products deemed best and an award for the best local campaign produced locally in any small city or town. Announcement of the awards to be given for 1926 will be issued shortly.

FAILURES FAILED TO ADVERTISE

Joseph Analyses Cincinnati Business Disasters in Light of Paid Publicity

Eighty-four percent of the business concerns which failed in Cincinnati during 1924, never did any advertising, Jesse M. Joseph, advertising man, told members of the Cincinnati Advertisers Club at their weekly luncheon recently. Thirteen per cent advertised in haphazard style and then only at rare intervals, according to Mr. Joseph. The remaining four per cent went out of existence, because of internal disagreements and other conditons bearing no relation to advertising, he said.

"It often happens that advertising fails, because of the indifference and absolute discourtesy of the sales people in a store," he charged. "This is the fault of the management, which has neglected to train its help in the art of selling and being polite to customers.

"You can't expect a clerk to compete with the salesman who goes from house to house and who knows his subject fully, because he has been trained in advance. That is why the door-to-door canvasser is getting the business while the clerk in the store, owing to a lack of efficiency, is not."

Some advertising copy, the speaker declared, is not effective, since it is written in "high-brow" language not understandable to the great masses of the people. Other copy, written by national advertisers, was classified by Mr. Joseph as "selfish," inasmuch as it is devoted almost entirely to a description of the product, leaving the local dealer in many instances without room even to insert the name of his store.

Mr. Joseph presented figures showing that $600,000,000 was spent in the United States for newspaper advertising in 1924; $300,000,000 for direct-by-mail advertising and only $150,000,000 for magazine advertising.

Thomas J. Dugan Dead

Thomas J. Dugan, telegraph editor of the Passaic (N. J.) Daily Herald, and said to be one of the oldest active newspapermen in New Jersey, died after a heart attack at his home at Clifton, N. J., Wednesday night. He was about 60 years old. Mr. Dugan had been at various times on the staffs of the Paterson News, Paterson Guardian, Newark Star, New York Evening World and St. Louis Republic. His wife and two daughters survive.

PLAN REORGANIZATION OF BROOKLYN EAGLE

New Corporation Proposed to and Accepted by Stockholders Will Insure Continuation of Present Policies and Management, Says Gunnison

A plan proposing reorganization of the Brooklyn Eagle by formation of a new corporation has been accepted by a majority of stockholders in that paper and will be put into operation shortly, it was announced this week.

Explaining the proposal, Herbert F. Gunnison, president, said:

"Owing to the fact that large blocks of Eagle stock were held by estates and other stockholders who had expressed a desire to rearrange their holdings, it was proposed to form a new corporation to take over the stock of the older corporation. A proposal to this effect has been submitted to the stockholders and has been accepted formally by a substantial majority and will be put into effect at an early date. This will insure a continuation of the old management and the policies of the paper.

"The Eagle will this year celebrate its 85th anniversary. The paper was established in 1841 by Isaac Van Anden, who was succeeded in the presidency by his nephew, Col. William Hester, who in turn was succeeded by his son, William V. Hester, whose son, William V. Hester, Jr., is a member of the present board of directors of the paper."

The proposal to the stockholders was submitted by the executives of the present organization, Herbert F. Gunnison, president; Raymond M. Gunnison, vice-president; William V. Hester, Jr., secretary, and Harris M. Crist, treasurer.

The reorganization is to be made, according to the letter to stockholders "owing to the fact that large blocks of the stock of the corporation are held by estates and other stockholders who have expressed a desire to rearrange their holdings, so that these holdings shall be represented by preferred stock with fixed cumulative dividend rates, and rights in the assets of the corporation prior to the rights of the common stock, while at the same time retaining a substantial participating interest in the earning power of the corporation over and above the amount of the preferred dividends."

The underwriters of the plan, who are now in charge of the business of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle say that they are "willing to undertake the burdens resulting from the issue of preferred stock and to assume substantially all the future risks of the business, provided they are accorded the opportunity to subscribe, at a fair price, for the common stock to result from the recapitalization.

The plan contemplates the formation of a new holding corporation in which the property of the present company shall be vested. It will have the following capitalization: $1,500,000 of first preferred 7 per cent cumulative stock, divided into 15,000 shares of $100 par value each; $750,000 of second preferred 6 per cent cumulative and participating stock, divided into 7,500 shares of $100 par value each; 25,000 shares of common stock; $750,000 of 6 per cent notes, of which $250,000 will be payable at the expiration of each of the next three years.

For each share of Brooklyn Eagle stock now outstanding, one share of 7 per cent first preferred stock, one half share of second preferred stock, and $50 face amount of the 6 per cent notes. The shareholder is offered $200 face amount of the new securities, in other words, $100 of 7 per cent, $50 of 6 per cent preferred and $50 in notes. The old stock is quoted considerably below $200 per share.

The underwriters ask that they be allowed to subscribe to the new common shares at $10 each in the ratio in which their plan is successful; that is, if 51 per cent of present holders agree to the plan, they be permitted to subscribe to 51 per cent of the common shares at $10. It is agreed that these shares, which will represent a majority, will be deposited in a New York bank for not less than ten years. The deposits are to be made by March 31, 1926, or not later than 60 days thereafter in case the underwriters decide to extend the option to shareholders for that period.

A. W. FELL BUYS DAILY

Takes 80 Per Cent Interest in Williamsport (Pa.) Gazette & Bulletin

Albert W. Fell, manager of the Pennsylvania Newspaper Publishers Association, announced Feb. 20 the purchase by him and his associates of the Williamsport (Pa.) Gazette & Bulletin. Mr. Fell himself holds 80 per cent of the paper's stock.

Albert W. Fell

Col. H. R. Laird, who has been treasurer and general manager of the paper for the past 16 years, will retire with the Brown interests, but will remain in charge of the business until April 1.

Many improvements will be made in the paper involving the expenditure of a large sum of money, Mr. Fell said, details of which will be made public later.

Mr. Fell is not new in the Williamsport field, having served as business manager of the Williamsport Sun for five years. Later he became head of publicity for the Congregational Church in America, following which he became publisher of the Hudson (N. Y.) Daily Star. Previous to last June he was manager of the New England Daily Newspapers Association, resigning at that time to join the Pennsylvania publishers' group in the same capacity.

JUST WHAT IS THIS YELLOW JOURNALISM?

"An Intuitive Grasp of Mass Psychology" is Belief of Winkler, Formerly New York American—"We're All Veras and Cravens at Heart," He Says Citing Big Cases to Support "Escape" Theory

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

Secret love letters in the Hall-Mills murder mystery, life story of Dot King, slain Broadway "butterfly," and a newspaper-shadowed Gould elopement—inside details of these vivid stories are told for the first time in this concluding article in a series on sensational journalism, as recalled by John K. Winkler, for 15 years reporter for the New York American, now writing for the magazines.

Mystery, sex, and gold, a headline trinity, is said by Winkler to form the chief ingredients of yellow journalism, a commodity which must be handled like pickles, let us say, not roses.

"WHAT is so-called yellow journalism?" John K. Winkler, former New York American reporter, asked and answered this question the other day.

"It is a type of journalism that intuitively grasps and panders to the yearnings of the 95 per cent," he said.

"I think every moron in America, male, female and Shubert chorus man is reading with interest these days the intimations of the Cathcart-Craven case. Every man of them would like to be an Earl of Craven, every woman a Vera. The yellow press, and most newspapers, I think, have at least one or two yellow streaks in them, merely provide means of escape for the repressed rabble."

Writing for multitudes of vicarious Veras and men who dream of a Craven escapade has been Winkler's business for 15 years. Now a magazine writer, he calls this past work by a far less pleasant name than even this implies.

But this catering to the subconscious selves of spinsters, unhappy wives, shop girls, stenographers, hungry flappers and the masses of men who yearn with Babbitt to follow the Earl of Craven to the African veldt with the shadowy nymphs of their dreams, must, in Winkler's opinion, be accepted as an important part of any newspaper man's philosophy, if he wishes ever to please the public that pays for the papers.

Winkler, as told in previous installments in this series, became unpaid publicity advisor for Mrs. Anne U. Stillman, and in that capacity aided in "personalizing" her to newspaper readers as the "nation's sweetheart." Because of this experience and others in his career of sensational journalism, he has reached the conclusion that "we are all Veras and Cravens at heart."

"We are all, I believe, subconscious wastrels and romanticists," Winkler said in explaining his philosophy. "We all yearn to be a Cellini or a Casanova. Even a Y. M. C. A. secretary gets a thrill reading of a sex scandal in the newspapers.

"A reporter in sensational journalism should be serious with the 95 per cent and cynical and satirical with the five per cent. The brainy reporter, and I mean men like Irvin Cobb, Herbert Bayard Swope, and Frank O'Malley, are men who recognize that news is simply a commodity to be peddled like pickles, es us say. The great majority of people ike pickles.

"Some two hundred years ago an English comedian cracked the line that roses bloom only in June, while pickles are beautiful all the year round. After all newspaper men are dealing with delicatessen minds. Most of the time we are writing about pickles, not roses.

"The technique of the ideal reporter s probably the most exacting in the world. He must be able to step from the evel to a West Jamaica negro elevator man to a Social Register drawing room without marring his stride."

Probably, although he did not say so, he quotation from Walt Whitman ingers in Winkler's mind:

"O something pernicious and dread! Something far away from a puny and ious life!"

A realization of the quotation, at east, must have come to him at the ime when the Halls-Mills murder mystery was front page news. It was a perect newspaper mystery, a story which vas springing daily sensations "far away rom a puny and pious life." About 00 newspaper men, Winkler among hem, were at New Brunswick where he bodies of the church rector and his hoir singer were found beneath a crabpple tree.

In addition to mystery it became apparent that "sex," one of the favorite eadline trinity, would play its part in he case. Church people were denying here was any sex affair, but the newspaper men thought differently. Most of them were interested in trying to learn whether or not any love letters had passed between Mr. Hall and Mrs. Mills.

If there had been letters, Winkler and many another, was convinced that Mrs. Mills was the sort of person who would have preserved them. They must be hidden, he thought, in the Mills home. How to get the letters? Who would know where they were?

One day bundles of the New York American were dumped off trains in New Brunswick. On the front pages of them was a box advertising the fact that on the following day publication of the "secret Hall-Mills love letters" would commence.

Newspaper men swarmed to Winkler. "Where and how did you get them? What are you hiding out on us?" they asked.

Winkler said he wasn't sure how the letters had been obtained by his office. Some expressed the opinion he had "faked" them. Today, he gives this indication of the manner in which the Hearst papers obtained one of the greatest beats of recent years:

"I was certain there was an 'Abelard and Heloise' love affair between the clergyman and Mrs. Mills. I was just as certain love letters had passed between them and that they would be found in the Mills home.

"Charlotte Mills, the 16-year-old daughter, seemed to me to be my best bet in getting the letters. If anyone knew, she was the person. With another newspaper man and another girl. One night I took Charlotte on a dinner party to a roadhouse seven miles from New Brunswick. Charlotte, I saw, glorified in the case. What she seemed to want most was to be able to capitalize on the publicity the case had given her.

" 'Yes', I told her, 'you have greating herself King before she was murdered. Where have you been all day? The story's been on the street since noon."

Jane definitely proved to Winkler that she had known the murdered Broadway butterfly. She said, too, she thought she knew the murderer. All night long they talked. Jane told that "Dot" had been a girl in one of her resorts. The man she thought must have killed "Dot" she described as a hanger-on with a notorious gang. He was taking money from Dorothy. When Jane was in New York three weeks before this man had told her he was through with Dorothy. He asked Jane to tip him off on the layout of Dorothy's apartment, to tell him where the jewels were kept.

"I'll get in there and choke the life out of her, and we'll split 50-50," he said.

Conversation in the Winkler apartment began to lag. One of the group went to the window and raised the shade. The sun was shining. It was 8 o'clock in the morning.

Anne Dunlap jumped up.

"I have an appointment at nine o'clock in Staten Island," she explained. "Hylan has named a ferry boat William Randolph Hearst, and Mrs. Hearst is to christen it."

She left on her assignment. Winkler telephoned the American he had a big smash on the Dot King mystery, and wrote the story which crowded other news out of the first page the next day—the life story of the murdered girl. To the police he gave the name of the man mentioned by his visitor as the murderer. They brought him to police headquarters, questioned him at length, but could not break his alibi.

"He is driving a gyp taxi in New York today," Winkler said. "I am convinced he killed Dot King."

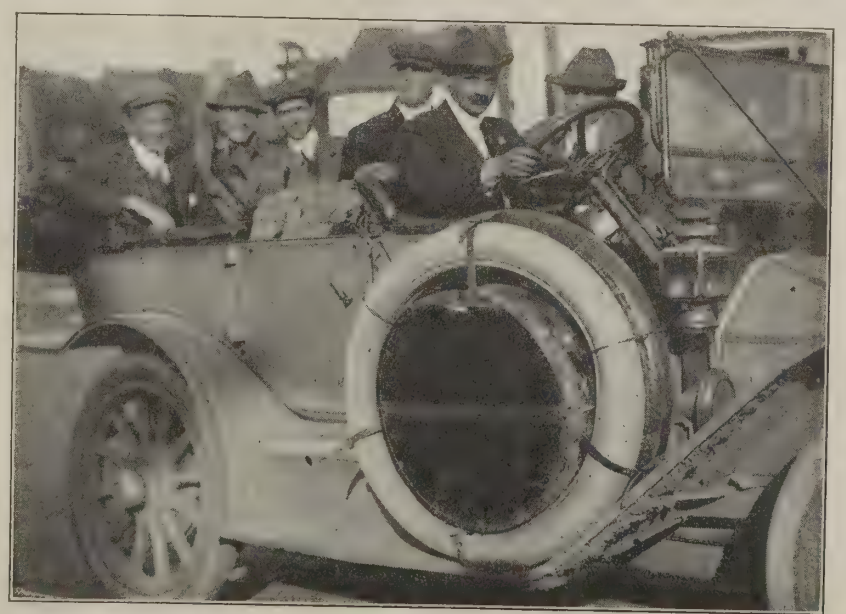
The mystery remains unsolved.

These two Winkler reminiscences have been stories of mystery and sex. A third he recalled has gold as primary interest, the wealth of the Gould family. Mrs. Winkler played an important part in "breaking" this story, which might be called the personally conducted elopement of Edith Gould and Carroll W. Wainwright. First news of an elopement of a young couple, socially prominent, in the millionaire class! What newspaper wouldn't fall over itself to get it?

It was cocktail hour in the Yale Club, New York. A group of members were playing cards in a corner, sipping as the pasteboards were flicked down. A young boy approached, excused himself, and whispered in the ear of one of the players, a prominent New York attorney. Nodding his excuses, the lawyer left the players.

A few moments later he came back laughing.

"That is Carroll Wainwright," he said. "He wants to elope with young Edith Gould, and was asking me in what state he should go to get married easiest." Others at the table were all lawyers. The speaker was certain confidence would be kept.



Another had overheard. In the office of the American, Winkler was called to the telephone.

"Here's a story might interest you," a friend said. "One of the Gould girls is going to elope either today or tomorrow."

That was all he would tell at the time. A hard tip to work on. The Social Register was consulted. It was finally decided that Edith Gould, then about 17, was the most likely prospective honeymooner.

Anne Dunlap went out to see what more she could learn from Winkler's Yale Club friend. Late that night she obtained from him the facts that the boy's last name began with "W," and had another "W" in the middle. Again

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

"Combining law and journalism"—John H. Perry

"A LEGAL newspaper man, combining the best features of both law and journalism," is the way John Holliday Perry has been described.

His background is one of the briefest in American newspaper annals. Born in Kentucky of a family which reaches back to Commodore Perry and beyond, he graduated at 19 from the University of Virginia and went to the Northwest. In Seattle, he practiced law and became appointed public prosecutor, in which job he distinguished himself for aggressiveness, and sheer legal smartness.

E. W. Scripps discovered Perry fighting stubbornly in the Seattle courts. He offered him a job as national counsel for the Scripps-McRae string, and Perry accepted.

This was 15 or so years ago when the Scripps organization didn't think a day in a new daily's life was complete without an injunction or a contempt of court party. Perry's life for nearly a decade was a succession of railroad depots, hotel lobbies and court rooms. He battled cases by the hundreds and never lost one. Later he resigned from the United Press Associations, Newspaper Enterprise Association and Scripps' Papers, and then turned to newspaper publishing.

He bought into the old American Press Association, gradually acquired control and turned it into a new organization. He also acquired the Autocaster.

He jumped across the country to Minneapolis and bought the Minneapolis News after operating in Tulsa as half-owner of the Tulsa Tribune and selling the Seattle Post-Intelligencer to William Randolph Hearst. The News didn't pan out well. Perry sold it and took a flight to Reading, Pa., after his fingers were singed a bit in Charleston, S. C. There he took the Reading Times and built it into a valuable property.

In 1921 he acquired the Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal. After this purchase he took over the Pensacola Journal, and later the Pensacola News. Before and during negotiations for these properties Perry entered banking in Florida with his brother Norvin. Starting with the Bank of Commerce, Latin-American Bank, and Merchants & Mechanics Bank they took over in turn more than a dozen. All the while his Florida interests were growing.

"I never have viewed Florida," he said recently, "as a get-rich-quick game. Anybody who has seen the state develop as I have seen it must have more respect for it. True, Florida isn't yet what might be called an industrial state; but its prosperity isn't merely the product of excitement or the gambling instinct.

"Florida will beat the world's cynicism by surviving its boom and continuing its growth.

"Naturally, a man who has so many hostages to fortune in Florida as I have, would be unwise to do anything else but laud the state. Outside of that, if I didn't own a paper or a penny, I'd be for Florida because my business judgment made me back Florida years ago, and that judgment has been justified in dividends, and in something besides—my own good health."

With his rise to fortune Perry has shared prosperity with those who work for him. He is not a large salary payer, but the handful of executives who grew up with him in the Scripps organization and joined him in his newer ventures have all progressed handsomely. Every one of them is independent because Perry pays with stock interest and bonuses. Two men, this side of 35, who have earned a livable salary with Perry for ten years, would each be worth more than a quarter million dollars if they "cashed in" today.

It is difficult to name any one mental trait as responsible for Perry's success. He is not the nose-grinding Alger of fiction. He takes things easily, lives a wholesome life at his Hastings-on-Hudson home when he isn't in Florida, puts in about five hours on an average at his office, and passes out all details to his lieutenants, giving the head executives full authority and holding them alone responsible for results. He commands loyalty and gives it.

One cannot say that he rose from abject poverty to riches, because it wouldn't be true. His uncle, John Holliday, for whom he was named, owned the Indianapolis News.

ROCHESTER DAILY SOLD ON COURT ORDER

Democrat & Chronicle, Morning, Assumes Ownership of Herald After Judicial Decision—To Continue for "A Short Time"

Sale of the Rochester (N. Y.) Herald to its morning newspaper rival, the Democrat & Chronicle, was ratified in a decision handed down Tuesday at Buffalo by Judge John R. Hazel of the Federal District Court. The sale was forecast in last week's EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

Announcement was made that publications of the Herald would continue for "a short time."

The decision was the result of a proceeding to show cause why the assets of the Rochester Herald Publishing Company should not be sold to the Rochester Printing Company, publishers of the Democrat & Chronicle. The decision provided that $235,000 shall be paid for the property, with the exception of some cash assets amounting to $5,000 and accounts receivable, said to amount to $127,000. Equities in life insurance policies held by employes also are excepted.

There is a stipulation in the decision that the Rochester Printing Company shall make a bid of at least $50,000 for the real estate of the Herald when it is sold in Rochester at public auction on March 29.

The Herald went into receivership on Aug. 4, 1925, and continued until Jan. 19, 1926, when the receivers, John W. Baker, vice-president and general manager, Ithaca Journal News, and John W. Remington, a Rochester attorney, sought an order authorizing them to sell the assets of the Herald to its competitor. The decision of this week confirms the sale.

Officers of the Rochester Herald Company at the time of the sale were Bruce Potter, president and treasurer; Edwin C. Mason, vice-president; William D. Manning, secretary.

Phelps Watertown Standard President

Charles A. Phelps was chosen president of the Standard Publishing company, publishers of the Watertown (N. Y.) Standard, at a meeting of the board of directors held last week. George Duffy was elected vice-president, A. B. Parker, general manager and treasurer and Miss Hazel E. Ryan, secretary.

The new board of directors consists of Charles A. Phelps, George Duffy, C. W. Valentine, A. R. Kessinger, Rome, B. B. Taggart, D. M. Anderson, Addison B. Parker, L. C. Mitchell, George A. Glynn, F. K. McEvoy, W. A. Mather, Adams, and C. J. Reeder, Carthage.

Libel Suit Hearing in March

The suit for $15,000 in the libel action brought by John Polakas, formerly publisher of the Binghamton (N. Y.) Polish Citizen, against Mrs. Marie K. Gomolska, publisher of the Slowo Polskie, Utica, will be brought up for appeal before the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court at the March term. The action was previously tried in 1924, resulting in a verdict of no cause for action. The suit instigated by Mr. Polakas was the culmination of a series of charges and counter charges between the two parties.

TO FORM GENEVA PRESS MEET PLANS IN MARCH

Favorable Responses Foretell Success of Conference — Committee of Organization to Be Named —Japan Shows Interest

By ALBIN E. JOHNSON
(Geneva Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

GENEVA, Feb. 12.—Definite steps towards the convocation of an International Press Conference will be taken by the Council of the League of Nations when it meets early in March, as a result of the large number of very favorable responses received from a canvass of the world's press.

So great has been the interest that the Committee of Organization, which was originally planned to have 12 or 15 members, will now probably consist of 40 or 50. This Committee, which will be chosen by the League Council, upon the recommendation of press organizations of various countries, will meet in Geneva early this summer, or probably late in the spring, to draw up an agenda for the conference and decide upon methods of procedure.

Inasmuch as most of the questions suggested in the communications received by the League are technical, such as telegraph facilities, reduced rates, etc., the sub-committees will be detailed to deal with these matters. Other questions, such as "property rights" to news, copyrights, etc., will be handled by a sub-committee especially qualified to deal with those problems while items of semi-political import, such as censorships, travel facilities and rights of correspondents, interchange of international news facilities such as tours, reduced railway rates, etc., will be discussed by governmental representatives.

Japan is the latest country to manifest interest in the conference and committees representing the Japanese press have been appointed after a series of meetings, to attend to Oriental interests and cooperate.

The response received from the American and British press has been particularly gratifying, inasmuch as it is admitted that these two countries are the ones which should be most interested. Because of the importance of the Anglo-British press, each country will be allowed several delegates—probably four or five at least from the United States.

According to plans, each of the press associations will be asked to name a representative; the larger newspapers, such as the New York Times, the New York World, the New York Herald Tribune, the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the Chicago News and Chicago Tribune, it is felt, should be entitled to a joint representative because of their large cable toll expenditures and interest in foreign staffs.

Since my last dispatch, press organizations of Austria, Bulgaria, Denmark, Latvia, Norway, Poland, Switzerland and Japan have sent to the secretariat additional communications regarding the Conference. In every case where interest was mild at first, the press has become enthusiastic over the possibilities for concrete benefits, both to the press and the public, through a Conference.

It is interesting to note that the press departments of all the Foreign Offices of Europe, without exception, have lined up for the movement—influenced undoubtedly, by the interest displayed by publishers, editors and correspondents.

Toronto M. E. Takes First Vacation

After 37 years service on the Toronto Globe, during which he rose from cub reporter to managing editor, Stewart Lyon left on Feb. 20, for his first extended holiday. Accompanied by Mrs. Lyon he will spend four months in Southern Europe, afterwards visiting England and Scotland. Prior to his departure the entire staff of the Globe assembled to bid him bon voyage. W. G. Jaffray, president of the Globe, presented Mr. Lyon with several travelling gifts.

ELLING GRAVURE ADVERTISING SPACE TO LOCAL MERCHANTS

cal Solicitor With Specialized Knowledge and Exclusive Gravure Assignment Can Make It a Profitable Medium for Retailers

By E. LESLIE WATHEN

(Rotogravure Editor, Buffalo Courier)

This is the first of a series of articles on the topic of gravure written by E. lie Wathen, exclusively for EDITOR & PUBLISHER. The next article will appear n early date.

IE mistake that most newspapers nake when they try to sell gravure rtising to local merchants is that they do not assign a man to specialize on gravure accounts. Consequently the advertising solicitor follows the line of least resistance. He quotes gravure advertising rates to the client, who immediately complains that it costs too much. This is because he makes a mental comparison of the differ- in price between gravure and black-white linage. The solicitor in turn es no effort to sell gravure and signs up for regular newspaper space at lower rate.

reason for the success of gravure advertising is no mystery. At the start, it has one hundred per cent reader attention value. The pictorial section interests every reader. They scan every page and advertisement. Why? Because it is entertaining and pleasing to look at. The other reason is that pictures of the actual merchandise can be faithfully reproduced. If it is furniture, the exquisite design is shown to best advantage; even the grain of the wood is visible. In the case of women's wearing apparel, the graceful lines of the garment are shown and the texture of the fabric retained. Gravure advertising is the same as displaying merchandise in a show window. The consumer sees a photograph of the article advertised which does not misrepresent or exaggerate, as an artist's drawing is apt to do—it instills a certain confidence in the buyer.

Copy for this medium should devote at least two-thirds of the space to an illustration. Actual photographs of the merchandise, artistically arranged, are decidedly preferable.

I advocate that the price of the article should appear on the advertisement, because, should the reader be interested in the merchandise shown, the next thought is, "How much does it cost?" If the price is right, the sale is sure to follow. Of course, there are some things that will not permit the quotation of prices, but they are the exception rather than the rule.

To stimulate results for your advertisers in rotogravure, arrange the make-up of advertising pages to have pictures (editorial material) on the same page or opposite advertising pages whenever possible. Keep the copy of rival firms well separated, but do not sacrifice the artistic make-up of the entire section to cater to the advertiser or you'll kill the goose that lays the golden egg. Service your local advertisers and help them prepare good gravure copy at cost and you will find it will pay in the long run.

This is not considered as good gravure copy. If the illustration had been a photograph of the actual bottle, it would have made a very attractive advertisement.

The following are a few of the important rules to remember in preparing gravure advertising copy:

ILLUSTRATION—A good clear glossy print (black and white photograph)—a photograph with detail and tone value (immediate tones between the highlights and the deepest shadow). Do not use contrasty photographs with strong highlights and very black shadows; it is better to use a gray looking photograph providing that all the detail you want to show is visible. Gravure accentuates in tone value, avoid too much black in a picture as it will be blacker in the reproduction.

This is an excellent example of the proper use of gravure. The advertisement is dominated by the picture and the copy is brief.

TYPE—Always use a good open light-face type and never use type smaller than 8-point. If you are using type to reproduce white on a black background or black on a tint background, nothing smaller than 10 point bold-face is recommended. Type faces that reproduce well in gravure are—Caslon, Bodoni, Century, Cheltenham, Bookman, Della Robia, and Clearface.

SIZE OF ADVERTISEMENT—Take enough space to make the proper display and use pictures. Do not try to cram too much type matter in the advertisement, if you have a lot you must say take big space so it can be read without effort. The best use of gravure is to let the illustration tell your story.

PHILADELPHIA DAILY WINS TOLL VICTORY

Record's Straw Vote and Persistent Campaign Effects Passage of Act Permitting Bridge Charge

Gov. Gifford Pinchot, Pennsylvania, and Gov. A. Harry Moore, New Jersey, have publicly congratulated the Philadelphia Record following the passage by the Pennsylvania legislature of an Act permitting the collection of tolls on the new $36,000,000 Delaware River Bridge between Philadelphia and Camden.

Work on the bridge had been halted while the two states became more and more deadlocked on the question of whether it was to be a free bridge or toll.

On Nov. 5, the Record announced in a front-page editorial that it would sound out public opinion on the Pennsylvania side to determine if the voters were as firm in their demand for a free bridge as public officials insisted they were.

A straw vote taken indicated sentiment in favor of a toll charge.

Governor Pinchot thereupon called a special session of the legislature to pass on the question. The Record kept up a vigorous agitation for repeal of the Pennsylvania act which forbade collection of tolls. The campaign was crowned with success when the act permitting toll charges was passed. The congratulatory messages from the two governors followed.

Rowe Stewart, vice-president and general manager of the Record, expressed pleasure at the action of the legislature.

"We do not consider our part in this agitation as especially unusual because the Record has always stood four-square for honest representation of the wishes of the people," Mr. Stewart said. "We took a hand in the controversy without bias and performed what we consider the function of a newspaper—the espousal of the citizens' rights.

TRAIL BLAZERS OF ADVERTISING

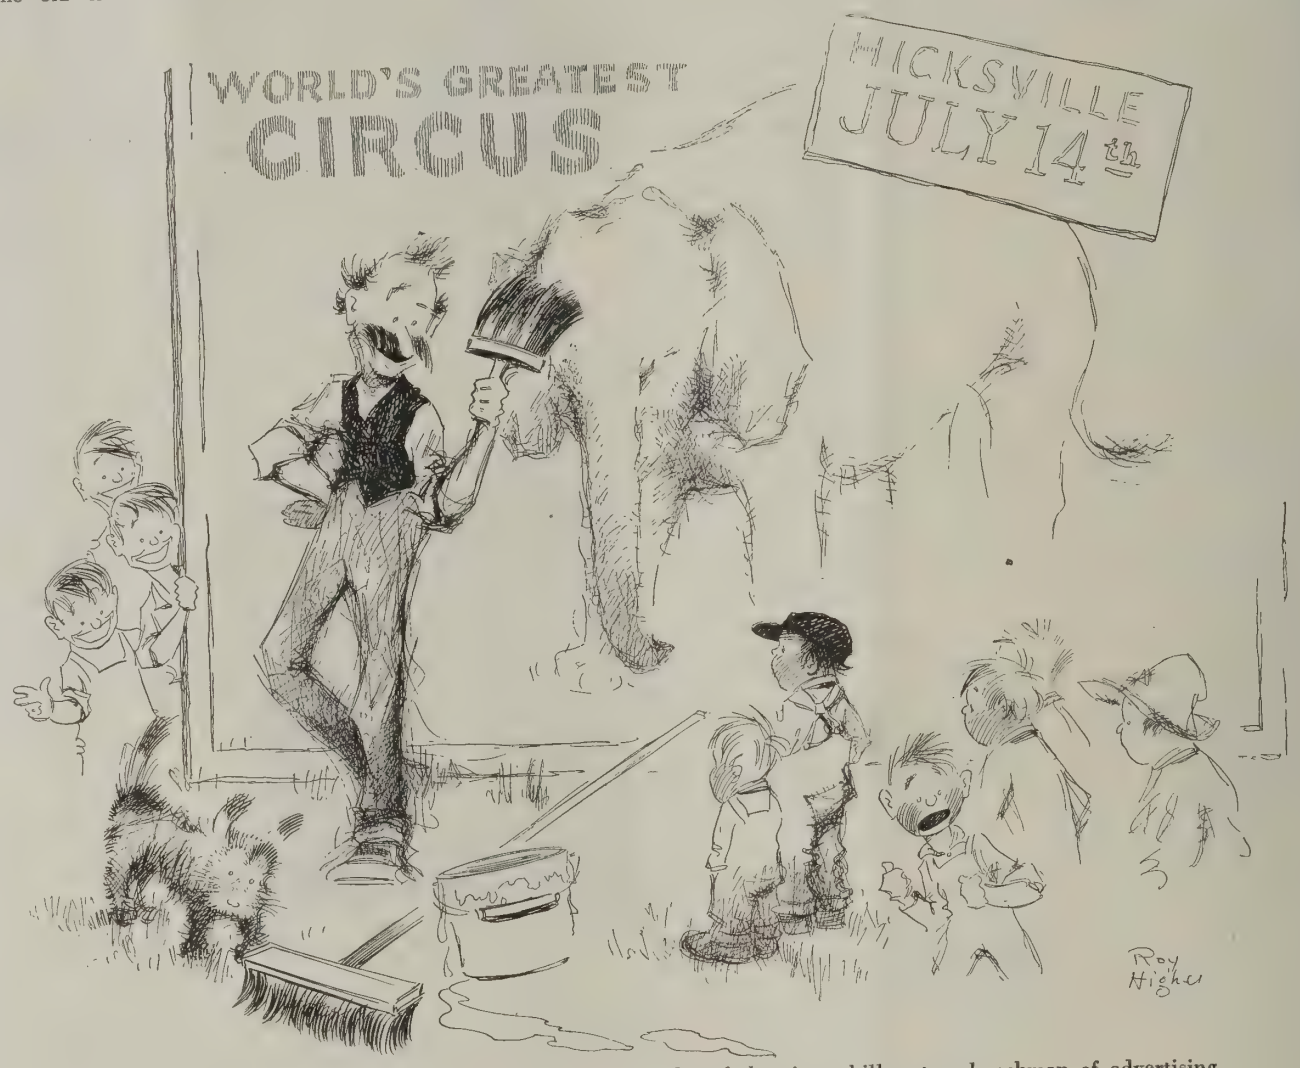
Chapter XXX



The Circus Bill-Poster Trail Blazer

IN advertising characters I have always been interested in the quaint, the odd, the queer and the eccentric. Among the host of ghosts of other days none is more in this class than the old circus bill poster, whose coming was the announcement of vacation days, bands playing, parades and great excitement.

When he came to our town he was the hero to all boys. His tales of travel in places afar off gave him a wide-eyed and open-mouthed audience.

Our town took on a carnival appearance when the winter-scarred billboards, rickety old barns, coal sheds, fences and telegraph poles became plastered with great glaring pictures of elephants, horses, tigers, lions and all ferocious wild animals; daring, gaudily dressed trapeze performers, funny clowns and all the other marvelous wonders that would be presented in the big tent.

We boys followed the bill posters because they were strange adventurers to us. They were champion world travelers, globe-trotters, adventurers and explorers bold—they said so themselves. They had been everywhere and seen everything worth seeing—and how they loved to brag about it.

Small boys stood goggle-eyed to hear the marvellous tales of the circus bill-poster—henchman of advertising

The old travel-worn advertising cars were like pirates' dens. Here were great stacks of colored bills, smelling strongly of printer's ink, and the barrels of flour for making paste. The walls were covered with pictures of famous actresses in tights, which at that time were considered scandalous. The comfortable, tousled bunks and littered tables all appealed to youthful imaginations. The youth who was permitted to sit in a confab within these cherished walls was considered most lucky.

The life of a circus bill poster provided thrills enough to lure boys away from home. We loitered about the car to help, and to be invited to enjoy the privilege of those marvelous abodes.

About the most miraculous things in my life had been Robinson Caruso, the magic lantern, medicine show Indians, skillful knife-throwers, rope walkers, ventriloquists and sleight-of-hand performers. But these things faded into nothing when the bill posters told what they had seen. They had seen the splendor of large cities and states. They told marvelous tales of travel in Mexico, Canada, South America and foreign countries. Bull fights, bandits, gambling dens and perils galore had been encountered in their rambling about in the advertising cars of the circus.

In large cities they had seen all the wickedness and evils. In whispers of awe they told of Custom House Row in Chicago; Over the Rhine in Cincinnati; Utah Street in El Paso; Barbary Coast in San Francisco, and hundreds of other widely advertised spots of wickedness in the world.

In those days great sections of vice were licensed and protected by law. Stories of these dens of iniquity were passed around eagerly, giving them the most extensive advertising. The old-timers who spun these yarns, chewed scrap, swore and talked, and acted as we thought men of the world acted.

But the life of a traveling bill poster was not all spinning yarns of evils, crimes and marvels. They had to work hard, because every man on the crew had much territory to cover each day with his posters, banners and telegraph pole cards.

Loaded down with two large buckets of paste, brushes and bills he set out to cover boards, fences and barns. He was always accompanied by a gang of boys eager to lend a helping hand and get a free "comp" to the circus. No matter what the weather, rain or shine, he had to get those marvelous posters up. His work had to be finished when the car was ready to move on to the next stop.

Boys in small towns learned much about other lands and the wonders they never even dreamed of from these traveling circus advertising men. Marvelous were their tales of adventure, superb were the pictures they painted of the circus to follow in their wake. Every boy was tipped off how to help put up the tents and see the big show. Some were disappointed when they got hooked in by the side show tent erectors instead of the big main tent.

If the gaudy colored posters did not sell the community, the boys by word of mouth advertised the wonders of the circus. They knew all about everything because, hadn't Joe, the bill poster, sworn it was true?

These advertising wanderers were heroes to the small town boys. There was always a fight to be the first to help in carrying the buckets of paste or piles of paper. It was looking over the horizon into a new world to see these great gobs and splashes of color going up slowly, forming a picture which once seen never can be forgotten.

Schemes I Have Worked

FROM the start I had a scheme mind. There was a peculiar fascination in the old guessing contests, prize and name contests; the Rebus; What's What, Who's Who, and that endless number of schemes used to get quick action.

While some schemes and contests were worthless, others possessed merit because they lived up to conditions and delivered what they claimed to deliver.

Who can say that they were all bad for advertising? They certainly brought results. And my first lesson in advertising was "Results are what count."

There was that famous old "Presi

Detroit News Advertisement Brings Thousands

A DOUBLE truck advertisement published exclusively in The Detroit News brought the crowd of people pictured above to the Brushaber Furniture Company's doors on a zero morning. So great was the response that people had to be kept in line for hours nor were the articles advertised of such a nature as to bring out only the professional bargain hunters. The people were well dressed middle class shoppers of the type that has learned to read advertising in The News with confidence. This reader faith plus the great circulation of The News that thoroughly covers the whole Detroit market is the combination that many of the world's most famous advertisers have put to use to win for them rich returns from America's Fourth City. And that combination is responsible for the publication by The Detroit News during 1925 of 33,366,494 lines of advertising—the greatest volume among all metropolitan newspapers.

NATIONAL ADVERTISING LOSING SALES THROUGH LACK OF LOCAL TIE-UPS

Telling Where to Buy Should Be Important Feature of All General Copy, Ad Director Declares, Citing Experiences With Manufacturers

By R. T. SNODGRASS

Advertising Director, St. Paul Dispatch-Pioneer-Press

THE other day we ran an advertisement for Tower Fish Brand Slickers. Several of my friends asked me where they could buy one at retail in St. Paul. One man told me he had called on five retailers without finding them.

RHEY T. SNODGRASS

The fact is that these goods have a very fair distribution here, sufficient to fully justify local advertising. Of course, out of the several hundred possible retail outlets, there are plenty who do not carry this excellent line.

This instance is but typical of the experience and observation which I have had for some 25 years in connection with national and local advertising. It points with a flaming arrow to the one great overlooked and neglected element in advertising which is costing millions upon millions of dollars.

We hear a lot of talk about national advertising. There ain't no such animal. In its last analysis, all selling is retail selling and all advertising is retail advertising. It is local. It is individual, personal. The simple exchange of a piece of goods for a piece of money over a piece of wood or glass in a retail store is the essence of all business. The great national monumental business institutions are great simply because they make more of these simple transactions. Big business is just an accumulation of trifles.

Your average customer, the type that makes for volume, is not very intellectual, not over-persistent, not likely to pound her fist on the counter and "want what she wants." She is still less likely to wear out her shoes and temper chasing all over town after the advertised brand even though she had her mind made up to buy it at the moment while she was reading the ad.

What would you think of a man who opened a hardware store in St. Paul, for example, and placed a fine big announcement of his business in the St. Paul Dispatch but never mentioned the location of the store? Once I asked a friend to write a speech for me and he handed me Webster's unabridged dictionary and said "Your speech is in this book, my boy." All I had to do was to find the words.

That was not a bit more ridiculous than placing an advertisement in a newspaper or magazine urging people to buy something and withholding from them the secret hiding place of the goods.

Recently I wrote to 15 national advertisers asking their consent to obtain local tie-ups from retailers handling their goods so that when their advertising appeared in our paper customers might be directed to the stores handling the goods. This is not very profitable business for a newspaper to solicit as the tie-up copy is extremely small and the labor of getting it extremely large. My whole purpose was to make the advertising pay the advertiser, to sell more goods.

Out of the 15 national advertisers one answered in the affirmative, three in the negative and 11 never answered at all. One or two explained that if a few retailers ordered tie-ups the others who did not might feel that an injustice was done them. What a stupid viewpoint! They might just as well refuse to place their goods on sale with some retailers on the ground that the others who would not handle their goods might become permanently angry and never handle them. Nothing is fairer and more stimulating to sales than the honest, energetic promotion of sales. Volume makes volume and success begets success. The more sales a retailer makes of a given line the more retailers want to handle that line.

On the other side of the case, there are a few national advertisers who have found the truth of our statement that all selling is local selling and all advertising local advertising. These few take measures to acquaint consumers with the places where their goods may be purchased just as carefully as they promote the merits of the goods themselves. So far as I know, without a single exception this method of advertising pays out of all proportion to the needle in the haystack policy. A moment's thought will convince any mind that this must be so. The most common, universal thought in the human mind is to want things. The advertiser couples up with this thought and induces the individual to want his particular article. The very next question is "where can I get it?" Ordinarily, it will not do to say "at all dealers" for out of the hundreds of advertised brands there are very few which have such perfect distribution.

Even in the case of these few, a woman does not visualize all grocers or all druggists. She visualizes some particular grocer or druggist, perhaps several, but not many. If there is one near her home or one which she patronizes quite regularly that is the one she visualizes.

Suppose it is true that every druggist in St. Paul carries your goods. It is not true but suppose it were. There are about 160 of them. To print the names and addresses would not require much newspaper space in proportion to the possibilities of this market. Arrange them territorially, and every woman in town will run down the list to see if her pet druggist is there. It is human nature, it is irresistible. She will do this even if she has not made up her mind to buy. The very process helps to make up her mind. This is not theory, it is proved. Ask any advertiser who has tried it.

In our office we have standing orders from a number of retailers to run tie-up copy whenever certain national advertisers appear in our paper. These retailers know by their own experience that it is highly profitable. The national advertiser in these cases also knows it is profitable because he sells more goods in this market.

Instead of a few such cases, we should have hundreds. If the local retailer does not or will not enter into the tie-up, this does not relieve the national advertiser of his desire and duty to move goods in this market. He should face that duty, on his own selfish behalf, and provide the consumers (whom he regards as his customers) with explicit directions where to buy the goods.

It is all very well to furnish elaborate display cards and window trims. These things supply the "here and now" provided the customer is "here and now." To draw in the larger scattered volume of sales, however, and bring them to the point of retail outlet, the "where to get it" phase of advertising is just as vital as the "what to get."

A few, only a few, national advertisers are awakening to this simple truth. We have evidence of this awakening in occasional letters from national advertisers calling attention to their magnificent magazine advertising and requesting us because of it to run our legs off securing local tie-ups. Just picture that! They are those who would play Hamlet without Hamlet. We can forgive them only because they are heading in the right direction and probably will ultimately arrive.

When the national advertisers more generally see the gap in their operations due to the lack of this simple process of local tie-up their volume will certainly increase, their sales costs diminish. There will be far fewer retailers greeting their salesmen with shelves of unsold goods and doleful tales of the failure of national advertising to create local sales.

ASSOCIATES HONOR LYNCH

Press Room Chief Tendered Banquet Marking 40th Year on Paper

John J. Lynch, superintendent of the press rooms of the New York Herald Tribune, was guest of honor at a dinner given on Sunday, Feb. 21, at the Hotel Roosevelt by 1,000 friends and associates, on the fortieth anniversary of his entrance into newspaper work. His comrades in the mechanical department and friends presented Mr. Lynch with an inscribed gold watch and a check for $1,000.

In 1887 "Jack" Lynch, then 17 years old, began his apprenticeship on the New York Herald, and since then he has become internationally known in the pressmen's union. It was he who initiated the Prince of Wales into the mysteries of the press room, when the British heir visited the Herald Tribune a year and a half ago.

A feature of the dinner was the publication of a special newspaper for the occasion, the Lynch Evening Banqueter. George F. Hufnagle and William McCaddin were executive secretaries of the committee in charge of arrangements. The executive committee consisted of John B. Moran, chairman; G. F. Gillen, R. M. Somers, T. A. Ryan, M. A. Kane, W. H. Butler and J. Oswald.

EDITORS AIDING SOUTH SOLVE EDUCATIONAL PROBLEMS

NEWSPAPER men of the South called in conference at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., recently were asked to analyze the present educational situation in the Southern States and recommend measures for improvement.

The following list of questions was given for consideration to the newspaper men attending the Conference:

1. What is the amount of funds invested in collegiate and university work in the South as compared with the amount of capital invested in Southern commercial and industrial enterprises? What share of the wealth produced in the South within the last five years has gone to benefit colleges and universities in the South?

2. How much do the people of each state of the South give toward higher education in their state, both in taxes and donations, as compared to benefactions from outside sources?

3. What are the sources of collegiate revenue and how may they be increased? Upon whom should rest the responsibility for providing needed funds?

4. Cannot the newspapers ascertain from the business men of their communities their opinions as to what service to the industry of the South the colleges and universities should render, both in student training and in faculty research?

5. Can efficient service be expected from the colleges and universities of the South on the basis of their present equipment and salaries paid to faculty members?

6. What is the character of the service to the community now rendered by the universities, colleges and professional schools of the various Southern States?

7. What should the Southern States properly spend for higher education? What is spent in other sections? How does each Southern state now rank in this regard?

Liberty Magazine was declared barred from Canada Feb. 22, in an announcement made by George H. Boivine, Minister of Customs and Excise, who declared it was excluded on the ground that it published articles about the Prince of Wales and the late Queen Mother Alexandra which were misrepresentations and libelous.

J. M. Patterson, president of Liberty issued a statement saying some members of the Canadian Government seemed to hold a "mistaken impression" in barring the magazine from Canadian mails, and continued:

"Nothing can be further from the fact. On the contrary, she was shown as a great and noble lady who sustained in silence and fortitude those trials which have come to many queens.

"In fact, especially in the older days, it was the common lot of queens to see their royal consorts attracted by the many fair faces which always lay in siege for such attentions. There is nothing, we believe, in our history which has not been a matter of common knowledge in wide circles."

U. S. RESTRAINS OSTERMOOR COMPANY FROM MISLEADING ADVERTISING

Trade Commission Bars Use of Trade-Mark Showing Undue Resiliency of Material Used in Firm's Mattresses

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 25.—By an order issued by the Federal Trade Commission, the Ostermoor & Co., of New York City, is required to discontinue the use of misleading pictorial representations of mattresses manufactured by it and offered for sale to the general public. Commissioner Humphrey dissented.

According to the Commission's findings, Edwin A. Ames, named individually in the proceedings, owns practically all of the capital stock of the Ostermoor Company which was a pioneer in the making of cotton felt mattresses composed of layers of cotton compressed and tufted at various points. It was found that the company adopted many years ago a trademark consisting of a picture of a mattress of which one part appears finished or complete, and the other part opened up, disclosing expanded superimposed layers of a fabric material.

It was further found that the pictorial representations of Ostermoor mattresses appearing upon the labels and in the advertising of respondent, grossly exaggerated the expansion which actually occurs in the mattress filling freed at one end from restraint. The picture indicates an expansion of a 4-inch restrained mattress when opened at the end, to about 35 inches or more, whereas it was found as a matter of fact that the actual expansion did not exceed from three to six inches above the restrained thickness of the mattress. This pictorial misrepresentation, the findings continue, misleads the purchaser as to the true resiliency of the mattress so labeled and causes the purchase of the Ostermoors in preference to competitors' mattresses that are not untruthfully represented.

The Commission also found that two of the registered trade-marks of respondent showing the opened end of mattresses tremendously expanded, but without the figure of a woman, have been cancelled by the United States Patent Office on the ground that such trade-marks are descriptive. This ruling has been sustained by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

The complete order requires Edwin A. Ames, Edwin A. Ames trading as Ostermoor & Co., and Ostermoor & Co., to cease and desist from directly or indirectly:

(1) Representing pictorially, mattresses or cushions with expanded superimposed layers of a fabric material appearing from a partly opened up cover, with or without a woman in the act of attaching a binding to said cover, or in the act of placing the uppermost layer in position, where the exposed superimposed layers of fabric material are represented or depicted as being expanded to a thickness greater than the thickness of the expansion that would actually occur without artificial manipulation were the ends of said mattresses or cushions partly opened up as represented in said pictures.

(2) Representing pictorially, mattresses or cushions tufted on parts, of which one part appears finished or complete and the other part appears partly opened up, disclosing expanded superimposed layers of the fabric material, where the expanded superimposed layers of fabric material are represented or depicted as being expanded to a thickness greater than the thickness of the expansion that would actually occur without artificial manipulation were the ends of said mattresses, or cushions partly opened up as represented in said pictures.

(3) Representing pictorially or by reading matter in catalogues, advertising matter or otherwise, that the mattresses or cushions manufactured and sold by respondents in interstate commerce contain superimposed layers of a fabric material which when unrestrained, will expand to a thickness greater than thickness of the expansion that would actually occur without artificial manipulation were said mattresses or cushions partly opened up as represented in said pictures or advertisements or reading matter.

(4) Representing pictorially upon labels or tags attached to or placed upon the mattresses or cushions manufactured and sold by respondents in interstate commerce mattresses or cushions with expanded superimposed layers of a fabric material appearing from the partly opened up cover, with or without a woman in the act of attaching a binding to said cover, or in the act of placing the uppermost layer in position, where the expanded superimposed layers of fabric material are represented or depicted as being expanded to a thickness greater than the thickness of the expansion that would actually occur without artificial manipulation were the ends of said mattress or cushions partly opened up as represented in said pictures.

HUNT TREASURED CIRCULATION

New York Evening World Tries New Stunt to Pull Up Early Editions

In an effort to pull up circulation of earlier editions, the New York Evening World next week will stage a "Treasure Hunt," described as an old journalistic trick in new dress.

A real key will be hidden in a public place in New York, the exact place being told in a sentence of 18 words. Every day for a week definitions of three words will be printed in the "Home" and "City" editions until the sentence is completed. The winner will be the person who first finds the correct words from the definitions and brings it to the World office. A $200 prize is offered.

William Johnston, the World's suggestion editor, combined with the press agent of Douglas Fairbanks to work out the idea. Fairbanks' name is to be used in advertising the contest.

CLASSIFIED HANDBOOK

New Edition of the New York Times Manual of Classified Advertising

The New York Times has issued a new edition of its Manual of Classified Advertising, comprising rules applying to classified advertisements, with instructions to agents. The new edition consists of 40 pages, 7 x 10 inches, with an attractive goldenrod cover embossed in blue and black.

The Manual embraces useful information about classified advertising in the New York Times, including suggestions for telephoning advertisements, information regarding bills, adjustments, use of box numbers, the general rules and information applied by the Times to classified advertisements and the New York Times Advertising Index Expurgatorius with an explanation of each item.

The New York Times Index Expurgatorius is composed of twelve rules which are applied to the acceptance of advertising in the New York Times to prevent the insertion of misleading, questionable, fraudulent or otherwise objectionable announcements. Every advertisement offered for insertion in the New York Times is subject to these regulations.

Suggestions for the typographical style of a Want advertisements, announcements for Salesmen and Real Estate are shown in the Manual. The rules of the New York Times against religious discrimination in advertisements are carefully explained. Then follows a summary of regulations for each classification from Announcements to Shoppers' Columns, including Automobile Exchange, Business Opportunities, Lost and Found, Help Wanted, Real Estate, Rai Exchange, Rooms and Board, Situati Wanted, etc.

Samples of forms used by the Adju ment Department and for the insert of advertisements; those used to obt confidential information on advertis under Business Opportunities and rega ing financial securities for which sal men are desired, are bound into book.

Four pages of the new edition of Manual are devoted to a guide charging compound and other words, which about 400 words are listed.

Under nearly every classification th are examples of the typographical st in which advertisements are printed.

U. of Oregon to Install Press for Artistic Work With Money Raised at Newspaper Conference—J. D. Thomison Named President at Two-Day Meeting

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

EUGENE, Ore., Feb. 21.—One hundred and fifty Oregon newspaper men, magazine workers and printers, the record attendance in the history of the meetings, attended the eighth annual State Newspaper Conference, held under the auspices of the University of Oregon School of Journalism at Eugene, Feb. 19 and 20. The Conference was voted the most successful ever held.

J. D. THOMISON

Dr. John Henry Nash, San Francisco, noted American printer, was the headliner on the program. Other speakers included metropolitan and weekly newspaper men, representatives of advertising agencies, publishers of trade and class Journals, and commercial printers.

Inspired by Dr. Nash's showing of great masterpieces of printing, including work of some of the great Renaissance printers and of William Morris, Cobden-Sanderson and others, the delegates spontaneously agreed to a fund sufficient to help establish in the University of Oregon Press a special press for fine printing which will be supervised on occasional visits to the Oregon campus by Dr. Nash.

This special press will turn out at least one fine book each year. Dr. Nash will contribute the hand-made paper for the book and hopes that a gift of special book type will be made to the university by a type company. A gift of $1,000 from state newspapers and typothetæ will provide such other additional equipment that may be needed. The San Francisco printer already plans to print the first Oregon volume in Cloister light-face type, cut by Morris Fuller Benton, type designer for the American Type Founders Company.

There is pending before the University Board of Regents a recommendation for the appointment of Dr. Nash as a visiting lecturer on typography in the University School of Journalism.

Joe D. Thomison, part owner of the Hood River Glacier, was elected president and Prof. George H. Turnbull of the School of Journalism, secretary of the 1927 conference. Mr. Thomison was born 38 years ago in Fayetteville, Tenn., is a graduate of Stanford University, and has been on the staff of the Glacier as reporter, editor, and owner for the past 15 years. He succeeds as president, George K. Akin of the Ontario Argus.

The program got off at a jump Friday morning when Walter W. R. May, executive news editor of the Portland Oregonian, read a paper on "Publicity, Advertising and the News." Mr. May attempted to state working principles for the maintenance of high ethical editorial standards upstairs and efficient business standards in connection with general news and such departments as automobiles, theatres, movies, and others in which the line between news and advertising is often difficult to define.

"I believe the problems that arise between the editorial and news departments would be more than half solved if the editorial department could get rid of what at times seems to be an 'inferiority complex' in relation to the advertising department," said Mr. May.

He ascribed this condition to the fact that in times past, when the advertising department functioned with close relationship to the business manager, it was able to force the editorial department "to do the thing editors felt was not good newspapering." Mr. May advocated the building up in newspaper shops of the spirit of mutual helpfulness—a good-natured understanding between the editorial, advertising, and circulation departments.

"Newspapers themselves are in part responsible for the school of publicity agents that has developed," he said, declaring as an example, that newspapers today almost demand that theatres hire publicity agents to gather and give the press the news that newspapers should gather for themselves. Many stories furnished by publicity men are good stories, he added, of interest to the public.

"If there is a publicity agent evil, it is a local one in every newspaper organization," he continued, "to be handled and remedied by the tact, the integrity and discretion of the various editors and sub-editors, who have a fair comprehension of what should be paid advertising. I believe we as editors have sharp enough wits to protect ourselves against unnecessary abuse in this respect, and if the business office would leave that entirely to our judgment we would fare a little better than we do now. I am frank to say I am not in the least afraid of publicity agents and the evils they represent. Their wares are to me often more interesting than the news that comes in from the police court and the Chamber of Commerce. Half of the features we pay good money for as bait to advertisers are little less than publicity for their creators."

George P. Cheney, Enterprise Record-Chieftain, spoke on "The Publicity Problem As It Strikes A Weekly Editor." He confessed that there are "very few items printed that have not advertising value for somebody," and instanced the story of Marion Talley's debut at the Metropolitan Opera as an example of this. Mr. Cheney, however, scored the publicity agents who, without understanding the field of publicity or its technique, bombarded his office with "stories." From some of these agencies Mr. Cheney gets three envelopes a week, each containing the same story.

The Friday afternoon program dealt particularly with advertising concerns, with papers by Frank B. Appleby, Agrande Observer; Fernon P. Churchill, Honig-Cooper Agency, San Francisco; W. C. Kaley, Portland Oregon Voter; Byron O. Garrett, Oregon City Enterprise.

A. L. Mallory, Tillamook Headlight, reported on his recent conference with other editorial heads on the proposed International Press Foundation.

The annual conference luncheon and banquet were entertainment features.

The Oregon Trade and Class Journal Association elected Warren C. Kaley, manager of the Oregon Voter, Portland, president.

PICTURES VS. TEXT

An old Chinese proverb says one picture is worth 10,000 words.

Philip A. Payne, managing editor of the New York Daily Mirror, put it to practical test this week synopsizing a novel in picture form for his publication. On Monday he was able to make 10 pictures do the work of 29,600 words from "The Temptress," a novel by V. Blasco Ibanez, which he is serializing. Each day the synopsis of preceding chapters is being picturized.

Mr. Payne himself read the book and dictated the necessary picture ideas to Louis Hanlon, staff artist.

The same managing editor this week also added a new stunt to tabloidism's list by starting the practice of running a Bible text in a box over one or two of each day's leading stories.

"I just want to prove that the Bible can cover every conceivable news story that can be written," he said.

When Earl Carroll, theatrical producer, gave his "bath tub party," the Mirror's exclusive story carried the text from Proverbs 23, 31, 33:

"Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright.

"At last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.

"Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things."

Because the Mirror had first printed the fact that the Earl of Craven was in New York, Countess Vera Cathcart, the "moral turpitude" victim, called at the tabloid's office first when freed from Ellis Island late Sunday night, Feb. 21.

New United Press Clients

The Orlando (Fla.) Reporter-Star this week was added to the list of new United Press clients in Florida, when full day leased wire service was inaugurated. The Reporter-Star also receives the United News. Other new U. P. clients are the Okmulgee (Okla.) Times-Democrat and the Melbourne (Fla.) Star. The Reading (Pa.) Tribune, which uses U. P. service, has added the United News report.

"GOLDEN SECTION" BEST ATTENTION GETTING MODEL FOR AD COPY

Tests Indicate Physical Proportions of Space Often Determine Pulling Power—Model Sizes for One to Six Column Ads Given—Copy Analyzed

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

WHAT shape of newspaper advertisement will get the most attention? As a result of a desire to get the most value for the most reasonable expenditure, many advertisers are giving thought to this question in connection with their 1926 campaigns.

Recently completed psychological tests indicate that certain shapes are far more pleasing than others if the advertiser will have the wisdom to use them. A check-up of small and large daily newspapers at random just made by the writer corroborates this. It shows that those manufacturers who cannily or unconsciously are applying correct principles are getting more attention for their money.

The proportion of 1 to 1.62 has the most pleasing effect on the human eye, it was discovered by Zeitung in 1855. Witmer in experimenting with many rectangular shapes came to the same conclusion. The closer an advertisement harmonizes with this law, the more it is likely to arouse a favorable feeling on the part of the reader. The proportion may vary a bit, in fact as low as 1 to 1.25.

The "Golden Section" applied to newspaper advertising, which has a column 2⅛ inches wide, would make the ideal shape as follows:

One column advertisement, 50 lines or 3½ inches deep.

Two column advertisement, 100 lines or 7 inches deep (total space 200 lines).

Three column advertisement, 150 lines or 10½ inches deep (total space, 450 lines).

Four column advertisement, 200 lines or 14 inches deep (total space, 800 lines).

Five column advertisement, 250 lines or 18 inches deep (total space, 1,250 lines).

Six column advertisement, 300 lines or 21½ inches deep (total space, 1,800 lines).

That this table, which is adapted from one by Mac Martin, an agency head, has much practical value is intimated by the findings of Richard B. Franken of New York University, whose experiments lead him to say:

"The results, taken as a whole, seem to indicate that the use of agreeable shapes helps the attention-getting power of the advertisements; and their use in newspaper advertising is certainly recommended."

Of the "best" three column newspaper advertisements in his tests, he found that 50 per cent conformed to this shape suggested by the Golden Section. Thirty per cent of the two column advertisements had the same general proportion. In single column copy, he discovered, very few advertisers are sticking to the law—in fact none of the "best" single column advertisements which won high place in his various scientific attention tests followed it. But advertisements of more than one column can conform to the proportion of "60 per cent longer than wide" to good advantage.

Franken's conclusions on this and many other phases of attention, such as position, headlines, pictures, length of time given the newspaper by the average reader and other important points have been made public within a short time by the Association of National Advertisers.

The writer's own analysis, which bears out Franken's views, was made solely with a view to finding out to what extent advertisers are applying this principle as to shape (without special regard to the other attention factors involved). Twenty-one daily newspapers were studied.

Wrigley's P. K. Chewing Sweet again and again stood out in the newspapers studied when in the shape of 150 lines by three columns, which is the exact Golden Section size. Large hand-lettering and at least 25 per cent white space helped get this effect. A study of other Wrigley advertisements, both two and three column, at random, showed they exactly or very closely tend to conform to the Zeitung formula.

A page nearly solid with heavy, type-crammed local grocery and chain store advertisements and a lower left position did not prevent 140 lines on three columns with ample white space, featuring Maxwell House Coffee, from standing out strongly in the Milwaukee Journal. Again, the combination of white space with agreeable shape won!

Robert Burns Cigars, with 140 lines on three columns, Ford with 145 lines on three, the Star car with 140 lines on three, Rieck-McJunkin Milk and Maytag, all offered exceptional attention value and pleasing form.

Cuticura, with 55 lines, was the most consistent advertiser in the various issues noted which exemplified the application of the principle to single column copy. Time after time it was found that Cuticura was getting attention out of proportion to its less fortunately shaped neighbors.

Ground Gripper Shoes with 60 lines, Pertussin for coughs with 55 lines, Hale's Leader Coffee with 55 lines, Nature's Remedy with 56 lines, Resinol with 60, Musterole with 60 lines single, Quality Cookies with 55 lines, and Blondex in 45 lines, came nearest to illustrating the use of the proportion in single column size.

On double-column copy, advertisers appeared much more accustomed to making use of the proper Golden Section size, 100 lines deep on two, with some slight variations over or under. Even though rather covered by other advertisements in a pyramided page and advertisement for California lemons in 90 lines by two columns drew the eye amazingly well with the aid of white space.

Bayer's Aspirin enjoyed an excellent showing as did copy for Edna Wallace Hopper, the latter with a photo of the actress and coupon. Even though 95 on two columns, an advertisement of fertilizer by the Planters Fertilizer & Phosphate Company, Charleston, S. C., was "lost" due to position and all-type copy. An advertisement by Frank Brothers, 105 lines by two, in the San Antonio (Tex.) Express, achieved far more than ordinary value from its money with the help of a snappy picture, white space and next-reading position.

Newsy copy on Palm-Olive, by Norma Talmadge measured exactly 100 by two columns. Others which benefited by the exact proportion were Stim (for falling hair), the Ediphone with hand-lettering tipped at an angle, Waterman's Pen, the Missouri Pacific lines, John Deere implements and Ernst & Ernst. Advertising of the Portland Cement Association and of the Terheyden Company, diamonds, the latter at Pittsburgh, conformed to the rule.

An example of how copy may be very unattractive in attention value to the ordinary reader was an advertisement. 85 lines by two columns, headed, "Important announcement." Surrounded with a border of heavy black, mourning type, John A. Hartford, president of the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, stated there was no truth in the statement that the A. & P. chain is to be acquired by the National Food Products Company. The copy was low in attention value.

According to the Golden Section, a four-column advertisement should be 200 lines deep. The outstanding pleasingly shaped copy of this width was a striking one by Calumet Baking Powder, headed "ONE TRIAL." Studebaker's 210 line deep advertisement and Dodge Brothers also ranked well.

Miller Bonds and Humming Bird Hosiery had the field to themselves when it came to approximating space 250 lines deep on five columns, with the exception of an advertisement with a coupon published by Wayne Oil Burners.

There was no lack of originality on the the part of some advertisers who utilized tellingly odd shapes. For instance, in the Niles City (Mich.) Daily Star, an advertisement, "New Ford models at reduced prices," in depth of 20 lines stretched across the bottom of two pages in one issue. Such advertising cannot help getting read—when the newspaper permits its use, which is seldom.

Will Rogers "did his stuff" for Bull Durham in single column in a number of papers. Outside right spaces, two columns wide and a full page deep, for Mrs. Tucker's Shortening and Shaw-Walker Files, were eye-intriguing. Wallace Bread advertising in four columns a full page deep was powerful. Camel Cigarettes, with space 142 lines deep across six columns, had remarkable attention value at less than full page or even half page cost. The copy "owned" the page.

Reduced from a three-column "Golden Section" model—the "perfect" advertisement proportion.

SUPER-UNIT PRESS HISTORY

1906 THE FIRST LOW-CONSTRUCTION UNIT was designed and PATENTED BY HENRY F. BECHMAN (Patent No. 814,510) for the DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY in 1906 after a long study of the inconveniences and problems of the decker type machine.

This was the type with units end to end built exclusively for years by the DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY and installed even as early as January, 1906, in a two unit or 32 page size in the pressroom of the New York Journal of Commerce and in many following installations. With pressure of work in the various lines on the DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY'S factory facilities in later years the building of this type of press was licensed by the DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY to Walter Scott & Company who have continued to build large numbers of presses under it.

EARLIEST TYPE DUPLEX PRESS—FIRST BUILT IN 1906.

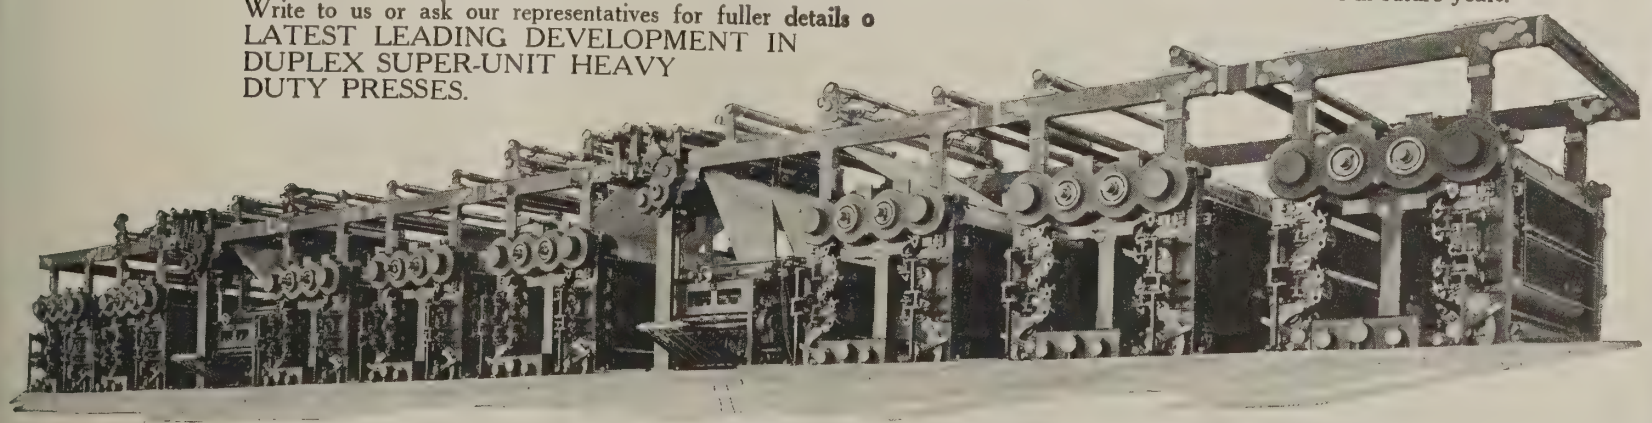
Five or six years of development of newspapers brought still further needs into view for press builders to consider, and the problems of larger production under new conditions. The advantages of the unit type were fixed and recognized, but the newer problems inspired another plan of use which was FIRST DEVELOPED AGAIN BY THE DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY under the invention and design of Henry F. Bechman.

1913 THIS NEXT STEP IN UNIT PRESS LEADERSHIP was also completely novel and the subject of a patent grant No. 1,054,493, issued to the DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY and Mr. Bechman on February 25, 1913. The construction appealed immediately to publishers and hundreds of units built under this design have been installed.

TANDEM DUPLEX SUPER-UNIT SEXTUPLE AS FIRST BUILT IN 1913. ROLLS COULD BE OVERHEAD, AT END, OR BELOW AS DESIRED.

Extremely successful in high speed productive work the tandem arrangement became from that time forward the standard Duplex Press for semi-cylindrical plates. It became so popular, in fact, that competitors who had, previous to Mr. Bechman's patent, confined themselves entirely to the decker type of machine, felt compelled to again follow the Duplex lead insofar as patent rights would let them. Specialized, improved, and simplified units of this tandem arrangement (with web rolls above, at the end or below, as individual offices may find most desirable) have remained the standard DUPLEX SUPER-UNIT PRESSES that have been DEVELOPED CONSTANTLY WITH NEW PATENTED FEATURES brought in from time to time.

1926 AND NOW ANOTHER NEW AND FURTHER FACILITY for publishers following the trend of the times and looking ahead to see what in pressroom service is going to be required for the greatest convenience of the growing and developing newspaper. Again leading, the DUPLEX PRINTING PRESS COMPANY is able to offer under RECENTLY GRANTED PATENT, the INTERCHANGEABLE TYPE OF DUPLEX SUPER-UNIT, designed and perfected during the last two or three days of analysis of newspaper needs and mechanical possibilities. This patent was issued on January 12, 1926, No. 1,569,065.



What is this new leading development, again the subject of a DUPLEX patent?

It is a standardized construction affording a SIMPLICITY IN PRESSROOM arrangement and rearrangement never before practically conceived. It is a method of press, folder, and roll unit construction by which COMPLETE INTERCHANGEABILITY OF POSITION IS ACCOMPLISHED, so that tandem line presses of these units can be altered in relation, just like dominoes in a row, at any time, in accord with changed requirements of output or production, sextuple, octuple, or five-roll or other combinations; or to accommodate additional units or desired changes in location of deliveries, etc.

No such boon has ever before been offered to the publisher who wants to put in fine equipment and know that without unnecessary pressroom expense or discarding of machinery additional requirements can be taken care of in future years.

NEW SURFACE COMBUSTION BURNER SOLVES STEREOTYPE METAL PROBLEM

Stereotype installation in New York Times office, showing the new gas burner.

ONE of the big problems of the stereotype room—that of keeping enough type metal in molten form and at correct pouring temperature to supply all metal necessary for continuous casting of stereotype plates—has been solved by a new gas fired burner application which has been adopted by many large New York newspapers.

It is known as the surface combustion stereotype burner, utilizes city gas, and was developed by the Surface Combustion Company of New York, after many years of research and experimentation. This system is peculiar to itself according to officials of the company. Combustion is maintained in a back pressure atmosphere so as to exclude all secondary air, and the flames are directed upon a refractory bed so as to develop the maximum possible amount of radiant heat. The flues are restricted and arranged so as to distribute the hot gas uniformly and to release them at the lowest possible temperature. The prevention of cold air leakage into the combustion chamber eliminates oxidizing effects.

The Surface Combustion installations are so designed that the furnace atmosphere can be varied at will, by either simply changing the gas orifice sizes in the inspirators in the high pressure gas system, or by changing the insert in the inspirators in the low pressure air-gas system. This is an advantage because in certain classes of manufacture, such as vitrious enamel baking, an oxidizing atmosphere must be maintained in the furnace to insure against the reduction of the metallic oxide bases in the enamel. In certain other industries, such as metal treating, an oxidizing atmosphere would be injurious to the metal, causing it to oxidize with the formation of scale. To minimize this production of oxide or scale, a reducing furnace-atmosphere is maintained. To insure this, the mixture is often adjusted to give a flue gas having not more than 1 to 2% carbon monoxide content, which is not dangerous because of adequate flue facilities provided.

The burners are made or moulded of alundum or fire clay material to form burner tunnels, which are inclined in such a way as to direct the flames in the most effective manner upon the highly refractory carborundum faced bed.

In the high pressure gas system small compressors are utilized to boost the city gas from line pressure to about 10 pounds per square inch before it enters the patented mixing tubes. These venturi mixers maintain fixed air-gas ratios over a wide range of consumptions, irrespective of the quantity of gas used.

Temperatures are controlled by the regulation of needle gas valves, which govern the gas flow. By raising or lowering the pressure, indicated on small pressure gauges, before each inspirator, the amount of gas supplied is increased or decreased, thereby raising or lowering the temperature. That is, the pressure is an indication of the quantity of gas being consumed. These gauges have a range of 0 to 15 pounds per square inch.

In the low pressure air-gas system the air instead of the gas is controlled by needle valves. In this system pressure or turbo-blowers are utilized to supply air to the inspirators at pressures varying from 1 to 2 pounds per square inch. A diaphram gas pressure regulator reduces the gas pressure to atmospheric, before it enters the inspirator where it is proportioned with air in the correct amount for complete combustion. Otherwise these two systems are identical as far as method of firing is concerned.

A typical installation is shown in the accompanying photograph taken in the New York Times plant, where high pressure gas is used. The New York World and the New York Herald Tribune also use the surface combustion systems. The New York Evening Post plant will have surface combustion high pressure gas equipment installed.

The installation at the World is equipped with an automatic heat control which automatically maintains the temperature of the type metal within 50 degrees F. An automatic heat control is also being installed on the system in use at the Times.

A short test was made on one of the four surface combustion stereotype furnaces at this plant with the following results: Three of the four ten-ton pots were shut down and the men detailed to the one left operating which was an Auto-plate junior type machine having a caster at either end. Every minute about five plates were cast, that is 400 pounds of metal was pumped out and the same amount of cold metal thrown in. With the gas at 8 pounds pressure the temperature of the bath was held within 10 degrees Fahrenheit and there was no falling off. In 90 minutes some 18 tons of metal had been handled. At this rate the pot was being worked to its maximum capacity. Although it is rated at 6 plates per minute, the rate of 4 is seldom reached. Only 8 pounds pressure was utilized although 12 pounds per square inch was available and ready for instant use if demanded.

The particular burners used in this installation are rated as 3000 cubic feet of gas per hour at 10 pounds per square inch pressure. This means that out of the 3300 cubic feet of gas available per hour only about 2600 cubic feet per hour was being used.

As a matter of further experiment, the pressure was raised an additional pound, bringing it to 9 pounds per square inch. In 15 minutes the temperature was increased 50 degrees F. This was sufficient to prove that reserve energy was more than available, and the test was concluded.

This speed of operation is characteristic of the burners similarly installed in other newspapers and is recognized as a long step toward eliminating the stereotype troubles of the past.

The Wood Bee-Line P

A SUPERB PRINTER ESPE

WE repeat: the Bee-line uses standard metropolitan printing plates made by an Autoplate Machine. These are delivered ready for press—cold, dry, and wholly finished—with great rapidity.

So great is the Bee-Line's accessibility that it can be plated and got under way in less time and with less effort than any other smaller-city press. Its ink may be set from the floor without reaching into the press, and every ink key may be sighted directly in line with the column it controls.

Y BUILT FOR HALFTONES

The Bee-Line requires no pit, and may be set flat upon any floor. Thus is saved the cost of a pit and the consequent loss of the basement beneath. The oily filth which a pit accumulates is avoided, and the incidental risk of fire or flooding.

The Bee-Line needs no paper hoist. All of its paper rolls are handled and run at floor level. It uses but one paper roll for products up to 16 pages, and but two for products up to 32 pages. The fewer the paper rolls needed to make up a product the less the number of stoppages for roll replenishment, the greater the hourly production, and the less manual labor required to run a machine.

WHO LEADS?

IS good taste any longer something to be considered in selecting the day's news for millions of people? One is moved to ask, after reading recent issues of some New York dailies, with the tabloids in mind as most flagrant offenders against accepted standards. Day after day, with scarcely an interruption, one, two or all of these popular journals display in headline and picture the crass indecencies of the Tenderloin and the half-clad forms of unfortunate women whose only publicity vehicles a few years ago were the "district newspapers" of a half-dozen cities. The districts have gone, their newspapers went with them, but their subjects have found their way into high society!

Not the Rome of Agrippa, nor the Paris seen at the Quatres Arts ball, ever produced a more degrading spectacle than the midnight party at a New York theatre this week, when a nude model pathetically splashed in a bathtub of wine, which she then ladled into goblets for 400 "gentlemen." Only the lechers of the court shared the Neronian debaucheries. A few hundred at most engage at a time in Montmartre's scandalous performances. Those participants got what they wanted and they had and have no noticeable standards of good taste or decency to be destroyed. But here in New York, the degradation of a comparatively few people, some of them notorious and some merely noted, is paraded by one paper before hundreds of thousands of readers, many not yet even adolescent.

The story is news, we hear. It has the elements of mystery, sex, and gold, ever lures for the pennies of the multitude. It sold papers, we do not doubt. The story was told not vauntingly, but with a pious air of disgust at the whole performance. But it was the day's feature of the paper and we doubt whether more than 1 per cent of the readers gave a thought to the reporter's trick of telling the tale. The posed full length picture on page one, the page-wide strip of descriptive drawings, and the display of lingerie were far more convincing than a verbal wrinkling of the nose.

This is not the leadership for which the people are looking to the press. It is the kind of leadership which leads the public to countenance the current revelation of the months-old provision made by Stillman for his alleged illegitimate child—obviously timed for publicity purposes in the wake of the Stillman reunion. It is leadership which permits an editor with impunity to name and portray a little girl as the victim of a fiend's lust—running counter to every fine tradition of the craft. It is leadership which makes the public wink at revelations of municipal graft running into the millions, and of even more iniquitous raids on the public resources. It is leadership which will drive a knife into the heart of the free press as the United States has known it for one hundred and fifty years.

Florida fertility is not limited to land—two newspapers now grow where one or none stood a year ago.

WELL DONE!

THE last thing that the publicity agent and the fast-working promoter desires is publicity for his own operations. Witness the speed with which a new "drive" for public subscriptions evaporated this week when the New York Evening Post turned a couple of real reporters loose on a tip supplied by morning paper want ads.

The first story detailed conversations between the reporters and the chief solicitor of the International Narcotic Crusade, a breezy individual who related his success in getting subscriptions by representing himself as the secretary of a local judge—any judge. That story stopped the "drive" before it started. The next two days' news reports sent the promoters of this and vaguely allied money-getting engines into a frenzy of contradictory statements and haste to escape prosecution.

The Evening Post has furnished excellent instruction in fundamental journalism, in addition to the great public service rendered. The clean-cut execution of this story is proof that the efficiency of the publicity man and his cousin, the crooked promoter, is in inverse ratio to the activity of intelligently directed reporters.

What man of you, having a hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it?—St. Luke, XV; 4.

MOTOR SANDWICH MEN

HERE is a suggestion for traffic executives, civic officials and newspaper editors who are seeking means of lessening traffic congestion in city streets and diminishing the immense losses it entails in public time and money:

Stop the use of the streets by vehicles whose only purpose is the advertisement of somebody's goods, services, or entertainment..

A few days ago, when New Yorkers were struggling afoot and awheel through snow-clogged avenues, four lines of traffic were stopped at 42nd street and Broadway to permit the passage of two lumbering interurban buses. The only function of these vehicles in this moment of transportation stress was the placarding of two entertainment spectacles. At this single point in their journey around the city, they delayed more than 50 cars at least one minute each. That was a direct and an avoidable loss. No one can calculate the indirect losses that resulted from the day's work of the "juggernauts."

We doubt the efficacy of this or any other "advertising" whose prime product is public resentment at its presence. We doubt also the possibility of easily convincing its users that the public does resent their methods. The important fact is that the streets are inadequate now in most cities for the necessary business of communication. Motorized sandwich men hamper the lawful business of all who use city streets and they do no service that cannot be performed better and more cheaply by other recognized media of advertising.

Robert Livingston tells a story of an old lady who remarked: "The newspapers used to brag about their scoops, but now I see they can only brag about their ancient lineage," which is another reason for dropping that silly middle "e."

NEXT DECEMBER'S DOLLAR

THE retail merchant who used to line up on Saturday night to get his slice of the workingman's weekly pay envelope is now bidding against every other merchant for a little piece of next December's pay check, according to a recent magazine article on modern instalment purchase practices. Bankers and industrial leaders are quoted as crying the doom of many if a slackening of prosperity interrupts the worker's weekly wage. Newspaper editors are chided for not attacking this dangerously tilted structure, the inference being that they fear to do so lest they offend advertisers whose welfare depends upon continued instalment purchases.

That last point is hardly true. Innumerable news articles have appeared during the past six months quoting respected business leaders on the dangers of over-reaching the national purchasing power. The "spokesman of the White House" has given thought to the matter and his pro and con verdict has been duly recorded on Page 1 throughout the land. Polls have been taken by metropolitan newspapers among business men and economists, with the resulting opinions about evenly divided. Can the editor draw general conclusions, applicable to local conditions, from this mass of conflicting evidence? Probably not.

Nevertheless, the public and private responsibility of the newspaper in this matter cannot be escaped. Newspaper advertising has been the instrument by which this method of financing the purchase of luxuries and necessities has largely been fostered. In no small measure, the tremendous increase in newspaper advertising during the past few years is due to the intense mercantile competition for the consumer's present and future dollar. The publisher has profited, probably to a greater degree than any individual merchant, and if tendencies dangerous to the welfare of the community have resulted, the newspaper owner and editor owe it to their readers, their advertisers, and to themselves, to do all in their power to check and divert disastrous consequences.

Never was there a better opportunity in this age of commerce to demonstrate the influence of an independent press over the consuming, distributing and manufacturing interests within its sphere. It will call for all the skill and finesse that the newspaper man possesses. It will not be easy to learn from the banks the factories and the retail stores what is the true state of the market's credit structure, but a respected editor or publisher can do it. It will be more difficult still to bring these people to end or diminish the danger, if any exists, and it will be extremely difficult to tell the story to the consuming public in a manner that will effect a change of buying methods and not cause irreparable damage to all. If the problem exists, it can be solved sanely, with courage and knowledge, not with hysteria or sensationalism, and the newspapers which set themselves to solve it should earn the gratitude of their communities.

There'd be no newspapers tomorrow if editors had to read every line of free publicity that reached their desks today.

THE POST OFFICE

ALL progress toward new postal legislation halts while the Moses joint committee awaits the report of the Post Office Department on the details of its December business. Two months have passed since the last penny of December income dropped into the postal cash drawer, but the department is not yet ready to render a balance sheet for the month. Six months and more have passed since the Moses committee circled the country obtaining information from the users of the mails as to the cost of postal service, under present as compared with former rate schedules. Obviously, age adds no virtue to this information nor to the missing data that the Postmaster General is expected to furnish.

The business of fixing postal rates becomes a circle of confusion—investigation, post office report, schedule disregarding both the investigation and the report, another investigation, another report, and a new schedule as haphazard and unsatisfactory as its precursors. Some day, Congress may compel the post office to keep books that reveal and do not conceal fundamental data. Then, perhaps, a workable structure of postal rates can be evolved.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

THE Newark (N. J.) Evening News was founded in 1883. In the 43 years that since have elapsed no member of the staff, in the memory of the oldest—and there are a lot of grizzled veterans on the News—has had a by-line on a story. Even initials at the tail end have been as scarce as eels' wings. These identifying marks began to be allowed to a restricted few only last year, with the exception of the Washington and European correspondents. The policy of the News has been that the paper as a whole spoke, but no individual.

WALTER J. FLANIGAN

Walter J. Flanigan came to the News in September, 1901, as music and dramatic critic. Ever since he has written acute, learned, just and conscientious criticisms of plays, concerts, soloists, actors and motion picture offerings. The most modest of men, he is known and respected by public entertainers the country over. But his work was entirely anonymous, and that fact suited his temperament exactly.

And, so when the time came for Miss Marion Talley to make her debut as prima donna at the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Flanigan betook himself to New York and sat in judgment, as he has done so many times. He wrote a penetrating criticism. It appeared the next day. But not in Mr. Flanigan's modest department of music. No. On the first page and, mirabile dictu, with a fitting start: "By Walter J. Flanigan, Music and Dramatic Critic of the Evening News." Thus was a sacred policy cast aside, and honor paid to a man who, of all the big staff of the newspaper, deserved it if for nothing else than because he never had, and never would, ask it for himself.

400 Satisfied Newspapers And the List is Growing

THE important newspapers in approximately 400 cities in the United States and foreign countries, with daily circulations totalling more than 5,000,000, use the Central Press Association's complete and exclusive illustrated daily news and feature service. A few of them:

Atlanta Constitution, Birmingham News, Indianapolis Star, Portland (Me.) Press-Herald, San Diego Tribune, Newark (N. J.) Star-Eagle, Duluth Herald, Buffalo Courier, Louisville Courier-Journal, Miami Herald, Omaha Bee, Denver Rocky Mountain News, Spokane Chronicle, Scranton Times, Akron Beacon-Journal, Raleigh News and Observer, Memphis News Scimitar, Worcester (Mass.) Telegram-Gazette, Springfield (Ill.) State Register, Davenport Times, Tulsa World, Wichita Eagle, Oklahoma City Oklahoman, Salt Lake City Deseret News, Houston Chronicle, Dallas Times-Herald.

Increased expenses in the production of Central Press Service have been offset by a steady increase in the number of clients, with the result that the base rates for the service have not been increased in nearly ten years, despite constant additions and improvements.

DOES YOUR PAPER GET ITS SHARE?

Religious leaders throughout the country are coming to realize the value of advertising to the progress of churches:

The Universalists have just published a publicity manual to stimulate and teach the use of publicity to local churches;

The Religious Education Department of the Abingdon Press has just published a new book on "Advertising the Church"; and Religious periodicals are stressing the use of various advertising media such as newspapers, posters, direct mail, and so forth, in the up-building of church activities.

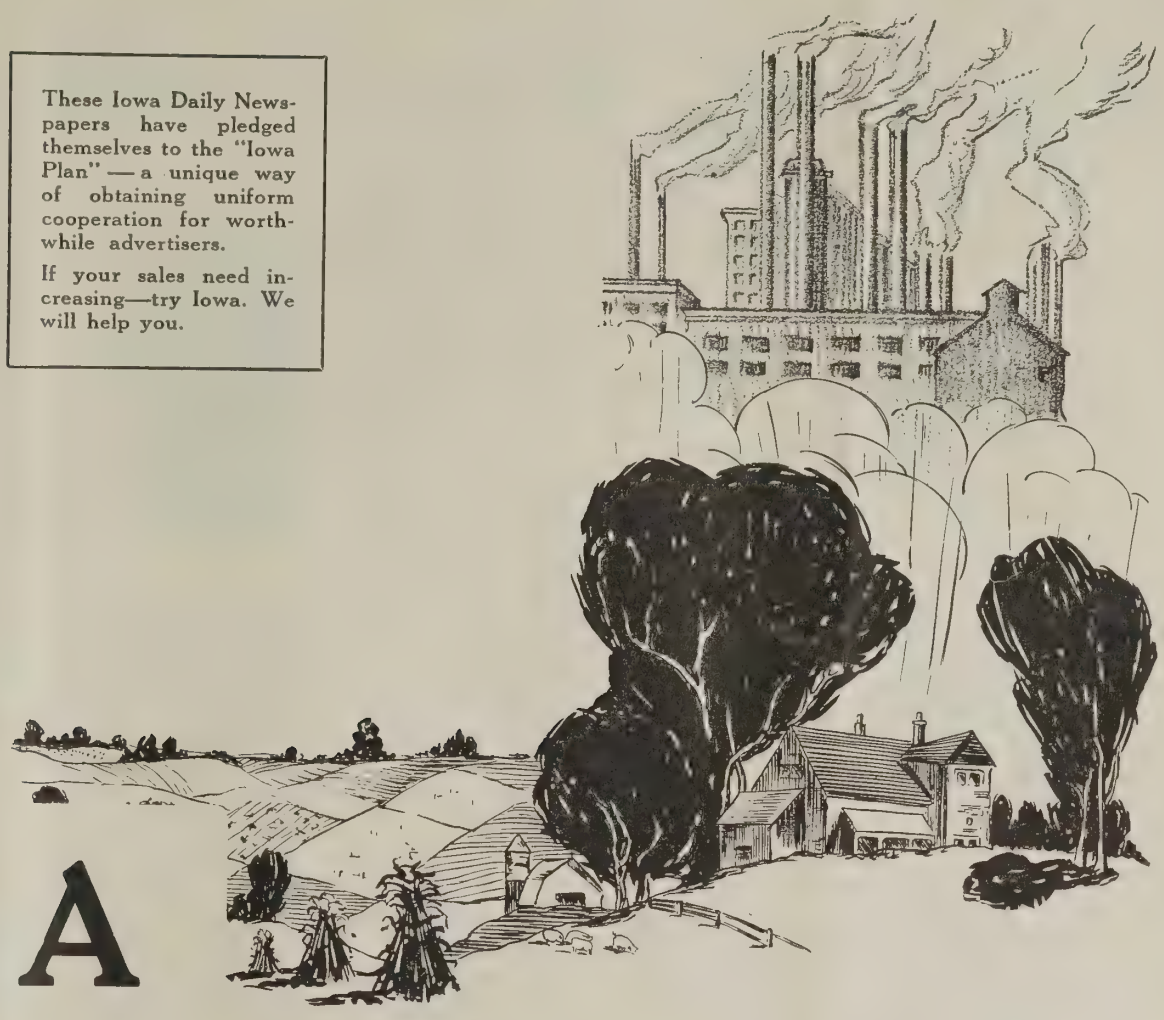
There is ten times more church news in newspapers today than four years ago.



Is your paper getting its full share?

Let us help you start a church page with our plans and copy.

ONLY three states have a greater per capita wealth than Iowa. It leads forty-four other states!

Although one of the greatest of all agricultural and dairy sections, Iowa leads thirty states as a manufacturing center.

In fact, agriculture and industry play an almost equal part in supplying the tremendous income that makes Iowa one of the richest and most prosperous sales outlets in the world.

Since every family in the state takes a daily Iowa newspaper, it is obvious that here is one of the most effective advertising mediums that money will buy.

Yet the cost is very moderate. You can completely cover the fertile Iowa market for only $1.77½ per agate line.

Remember, also, that your advertising dollars in the daily Iowa newspapers give you the added advantage of the Iowa selling and merchandising plan.

All the leading jobbers in the state are standing back of this plan. May we show you what it will mean to you? Full information upon request.

GETTY CLOSES UP LAST STILLMAN CHAPTER

United Press Man Obtains First News of Jay Leeds' Settlement from "Flo"—Had Made Contact Early in Case

Frank Getty, of the New York staff of United News, night wire service of the United Press, closed up what may prove the last chapter of the Stillman case, when he obtained exclusively Feb. 23, first news of provisions made by James A. Stillman for the care of his son by Flo Leeds.

FRANK GETTY

The United Press opened its day wires with a complete story for afternoon newspapers, and officials claimed that no other wire service was able to follow up Getty's interview with Mrs. Leeds, since she had left New York for Florida before the story was sprung.

Mrs. Leeds, soon after her name was first linked with Mr. Stillman's, disappeared. She was found in Paris by Webb Miller, head of the U. P. Paris bureau. Until then she had never been interviewed. When she later sailed for this country, Miller cabled to the United States suggesting that a U. P. staff man meet her on arrival.

Getty met her at Quarantine. No interview was "spilled" then. Later to Getty she told for the first time her own story which was sent over the association's wires in four daily installments.

From Mrs. Leeds last Monday, Getty learned the details of the settlement. She told him the name of a special Stillman attorney, who confirmed the facts.

Getty has been with the United Press for 10 years.

Lebherz Buffalo Express City Editor

Edwin J. Lebherz has been appointed city editor of the Buffalo Express, with which he has been associated for the past ten years. The Express has just completed installation of a universal copy desk, in charge of William M. McClennan. John Dunn, formerly of Syracuse and F. E. Jacobson, formerly of Jamestown, have been added to the Express copy reading staff, to which A. E. Backus and F. W. Morrison also have been assigned. Paul Schifferle, formerly Albany correspondent, has taken over the duties of the late Irving W. Moynihan, former city hall and political writer for this newspaper.

Leading the South In Local Lineage

ONCE more The Birmingham News led the South in the volume of local advertising carried in one year. The News stood second in national and second in total volume.

This tremendous local lineage is made possible by the complete coverage, the reader confidence and prestige, the character that The News has. Local merchants long ago learned that the cost per sale is less when their advertising is placed in The News.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

Milt Gross Signs 5-Year Contract With World Syndicate—New Serial by Hazel Deyo Batchelor—Gene Fowler Joins King Features —Stein Writes "Does Marriage Interfere With a Career?"

MILT GROSS Yiddish dialict writer, creator of "Gross Exaggerations," this week signed a five-year contract with the New York World and the

This is the way Milt Gross says he gets ideas for "socksassful cotoons."

World Syndicate, distributor of his copy.

In accepting the World offer, Gross rejected contracts with five other syndicates and a magazine. He returned to New York recently from Hollywood, Cal., where he was assisting Charlie Chaplin in the production of his forthcoming picture.

Before starting "Gross Exaggerations," Gross was drawing a daily strip under the title "Banana Oil." He is continuing his comic art work.

Asked for a sample of his dialect, Gross sat down and wrote for EDITOR & PUBLISHER:

"Tan rizzons how it should be socksassful cotoons.

"Rizzon No. 1—Be funny tan times."

Gene Fowler, former managing editor of the New York American, has returned from a pleasure trip abroad and last week joined the staff of King Features Syndicate, Inc., New York. Prior to becoming managing editor, Fowler gained wide reputation as a sports writer and editor. It is understood he will write some sports for the syndicate in addition to serving in an executive capacity. Mr. and Mrs. Fowler on their trip had expected to visit Egypt, but changed their plans, spending most of their vacation in Rome.

Another serial has come from the prolific pen of Hazel Deyo Batchelor. This one is called "The Marriage Meddler," and is distributed nationally by the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia.

Karl K. Kitchen, conductor of "Up and Down Broadway," for the New York Evening World and the World Syndicate, is at present writing about Palm Beach, telegraphing his copy north for daily distribution.

King Features Syndicate, in charge of serials by Eleanore Meherin, author of "Chickie," announces a new story by the same author entitled "Her Fling."

Martin Branner, who draws the Winnie Winkle comic strip for the Chicago Tribune Newspapers Syndicate, has signed a contract with the George and Billy West Moving Picture Corporation to do a series of two-reel comedies in which actors will impersonate Winnie and other of his strip characters.

Bernard Dibble, maker of the "Dabby Dingle" strip has joined the art department of King Features Syndicate. He is the nephew of Thomas Dibble, city editor, New York Evening Journal.

Kin Hubbard, creator of "Abe Martin" for the National Newspaper Service, Chicago, with Mrs. Hubbard are spending a winter vacation at Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Fla.

Norman E. Brown, sports editor of the Central Press, Cleveland, has been assigned to Florida to cover golf events there and tour the baseball camps.

Winifred Van Duzer, King Features Syndicate, has written a new serial called "The Good Bad Girl."

Lenore Lingan, formerly chief librarian of the Cleveland Press, has joined the staff of the Central Press Association, Cleveland, in the same capacity.

Hanna Stein has interviewed 30 famous women to form a series under the title "Does Marriage Interfere With a Career?" for the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia. Among opinions expressed are those of Judge Jean Norris, Galli-Curci, Elinor Glyn, Gloria Gould, Margaret Sanger, and Jane Cowl. The articles are illustrated with half-tones. Another Ledger offering announced this week is called "Sonnysayings," a one-column comic mat captioned with a baby gag, drawn and written by Fanny V. Cory.

LARGE NEWSPRINT PRODUCTION

U. S. and Canadian Mills Made 279,714 Tons in January—11% Gain

Newsprint production in the United States during Jan., 1926, amounted to 140,026 tons and shipments to 139,012 tons. Production in Canada amounted to 139,688 tons and shipments to 136,498 tons, making a total United States and Canadian production of 279,714 tons and shipments of 275,510 tons. There were also 13,862 tons of newsprint made in Newfoundland with 925 tons made in Mexico so that the total North American production in Jan., 1926, was 294,501 tons. The newsprint mills also made 1,379 tons of hanging paper in Jan., 94 tons of which were made in Canaua.

During Jan. the United States mills operated at 94.6 per cent of rated capacity and the Canadian mills at 96.2 per cent.

The United States mills made 8 per cent more in Jan., 1926, than in Jan., 1925, and the Canadian mills made 15 per cent more than in Jan., 1925.

The combined production of the United States and Canadian mills in Jan., 1926, was 11 per cent more than in Jan., 1925.

Stocks of newsprint paper at United States mills totaled 16,338 tons at the end of Jan. and at Canadian mills 14,602 tons, making a combined total of 30,940 tons which was equivalent to 2.7 days' average production. The newsprint Service Bureau's statistics for the month follows:

IOWA PLANS STATE PRINTERY

State Forms and Blanks to Be Printed at Anamosa Prison

The Iowa state board of control last week took a significant step toward establishing a state printery at Anamosa reformatory to supply all state departments with printed material. The superintendent of printing and binding at the reformatory was instructed to prepare a price list of printed forms and blanks used by the various political subdivisions. More than 800 forms have been assembled for estimates.

The "state use plan" has been center or bitter controversy in the state and resulted in the closing of the penitentiary apron factory as result of clothers' agitation, although auto license plates are being made there and prison labor is being introduced in other fields. J. B. Butler, Fort Dodge, chairman of the prison board, said, "the policy of the state board will be to live up to the law as long as it is the law," referring to the recent legislation which directed wide application of penal labor. A concerted drive is being organized for repeal of the law at the next general assembly.

HAYWARD DAILY NEWS

540 CASTRO STREET
HAYWARD, CALIF.

July 6, 1925.

Mr. W. B. Goode,
Manager, Pacific Coast Branch,
Intertype Corporation,
San Francisco, Calif.

Dear Sir:-

Herewith is what I believe to be a non-stop record for a slug-casting machine of any model or any make.

The latter part of 1924 you installed in the office of The Daily News, Hayward, California, a Standardized Intertype C-s.m. (No. 6416). Shortly after the installation I was put in charge. Although I had been operating machines of various models for nearly 30 years, this was my first experience with an Intertype. From the very start I had no trouble of any kind. As the machine was working so perfectly I decided to see what could be accomplished, and here are the results:

On January 1, 1925, I cleaned the machine thoroughly, including the mats. I started out, however, not for any record, but just to ascertain for my own satisfaction, what the production would be for a certain period of time; how many distributor stops; time lost repairing or adjusting; what attention the electric pot would require; and upkeep in the way of supplies or parts for the machine.

Results Accomplished, January 2 to July 3, 1925, Inclusive:-

Not one distributor stop during 155 working days. An average of 1700 lines (13 ems) was set daily, which means 263,000 lines in the 155 days. The lines averaged 28 letters to the line. Consequently 7,378,000 mats went through the distributor box and were distributed without one distributor stop and not one mat in the magazine at the end of the six months' run had a damaged ear.

During the period above referred to the heat on the electric pot or mouthpiece was not changed once on measures ranging from 13 ems to 30 ems.

The expense during the six months was $5.35, which included a few star wheels, mold wipers, knife wipers, etc.

Yours truly,

W. M. Campbell

Machinist-Operator.

MR. CAMPBELL made this test for cost-finding purposes only. He made no effort to create a record. We believe this establishes the greatest performance record in the world, and his six months' expenses of only three and a half cents a day proves Intertype's claims for lowest up-keep.

Intertype sales are increasing because of Intertype performance. What the Intertype is doing for the Hayward Daily News it can do for you. Write now.

LAWYER-EDITOR DEAD

Col. T. J. Randolph of Charlottesville (Va.) Progress Victim of Apoplexy

Colonel Thomas Jefferson Randolph, 58, attorney and associate editor of the Charlottesville (Va.) Daily Progress, died of apoplexy Feb. 18. He was a member of the prominent Randolph family of Virginia and a well-known member of the State Bar, having been admitted to the bar in 1892.

Mr. Randolph was a member of the presidential electoral board in 1920. He served also on the staff of former Governor E. Lee Trinkle.

The funeral took place last Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Randolph was born at "Cloverfields," in Albemarle County, in 1868. He attended local schools and went to the McCabe's University School. Later he completed his education at the University of Virginia, receiving degrees of B. A., Ph. B. and M.A. After graduating, he studied law in Norfolk and taught in the Norfolk Academy.

In 1913 he returned to Charlottesville and since has been engaged in the practice of law, and helping in the editing of the Charlottesville Progress.

EVERETT C. JOHNSON

Editor and Publisher of Newark (Del.) Post Dies at 49

Everett C. Johnson, 49, editor and publisher of the Newark (Del.) Post, died suddenly Friday night, Feb. 20, at his home in Newark. He was born in Sussex county, 49 years ago. Educated at Delaware College, now the University of Delaware, he was graduated in 1895. He bought a farm near Newark, selling the produce in the Wilmington market. It was while so engaged that he started his printing plant at Newark and the Newark Post, which was first issued in 1908. From 1916 to 1920 he was secretary of state of Delaware under Governor John G. Johnson. He was a noted orator.

Maj. H. W. Grantland, 93, Civil War veteran and grandfather of Grantland Rice, sports writer for the New York Herald Tribune, died at a hospital in Nashville, Tenn., last week, as the result of a fall. Major Grantland was for many years owner of a large plantation in Northern Alabama and also was cashier of the First National Bank of Nashville.

John M. Atwood, 74, day foreman of the Boston Globe composing room for the past 30 years, died Feb. 15 at his home in Dorchester, Mass. He had been employed 50 years on the Globe.

Dr. Samuel Oliver Young, 81, oldest native born resident of Houston, Tex., and founder of the old Houston Post now the Post-Dispatch, died at a sanitarium in Houston Feb. 17. He served in the Civil War in the Confederate army. After aiding in the founding of the Houston Post Dr. Young went to Galveston as managing editor of the Galveston News.

Raymond Bissell, 47, general manager of the Buffalo Commercial under the ownership of C. A. Finnegan, died on Feb. 23, in his home in Buffalo. Recently Mr. Bissell had been associated with the Cutler Desk Company at Buffalo.

George Olden Potts, 40, formerly police reporter and special writer on the San Diego (Cal.) Union and Tribune, died Feb. 9. He was a native of New Jersey.

Howard M. Kutchin, 83, who set by hand all of the type in the first daily edition of the San Diego Union on March 20, 1871, and in many other subsequent editions of that newspaper until typesetting machines were introduced, died in San Diego on Feb. 16. He was the first foreman of the mechanical department of the Union, after it became a daily, and was later its managing editor. He was editor of the San Diego Tribune in 1896 and 1897.

Christian Hegnauer, 67, until recently editor and publisher of the Mansfield (O.) Courier, died a few days ago at his home in Columbus. He formerly was connected with the Columbus Express and Sonntagsgast in Columbus and was well known among German newspaper men.

J. Elmer Mobley, 55, postmaster of Santa Rosa, Cal., and until recently publisher of the Santa Rosa Republican, died Feb. 15, at his home of heart failure. He came to Santa Rosa in 1891 to work on the Press Democrat, later joining the Evening Press staff. With A. B. Lemmon he published the Republican, later buying the paper. He sold it to G. Lansing Hurd of Corvallis, Ore., six months ago.

John S. Muchmore, 68, father of Clyde E. Muchmore, editor-publisher of the Ponca City (Okla.) News and president of the Oklahoma Press Association, died at his home in Winfield, Kan.

Maurice L. Vittu, publisher of the Hyde Park (Ill.) Herald, a neighborhood weekly, died Feb. 12.

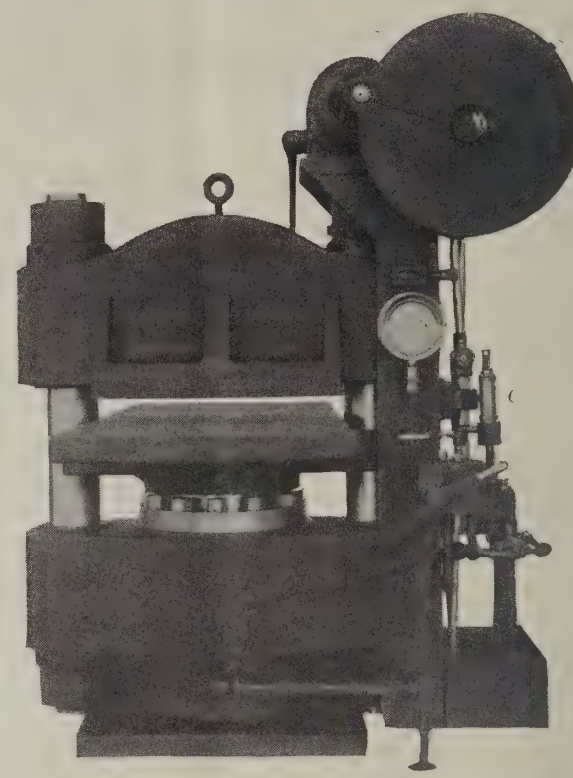
Harry C. Freese, 73, editor and publisher of the Hays (Kan.) Free Press for 31 years, died at his home recently. He retired in 1913.

Edward G. Ryan, 23, editor and manager of the Rochester (N. Y.) Catholic Journal, died last week.

Fred D. Sherman, 48, owner and editor of the St. Paul Herald and former state commissioner of immigration, died Feb. 18.

J. H. Brunemer, 87, veteran of the Civil War and founder and editor of the Laclede (Mo.) News, died recently at the U. S. Soldiers' Home in Sawtell, Cal.



John Wesley Knab, 25, a sports writer on the Cincinnati Times-Star, died a few days ago at his home in that city.

John Curtis, 45, former North Dakota publisher and editor of the Spencer (S. D.) News but since last summer in charge of a newspaper subscription crew, died Feb. 17.

BIROTADRUCK

Hydraulic Matrice Press and Process

Direct Pressure Matrice Die Embossing

The American Birotadruck matrice press and process is a hydraulic direct pressure matrice moulding press and process —definite in all its functions moulding a perfect die cut and embossed mat ready for the casting box without loss of time. Through the Birotadruck method pressure on the machine is under complete control, without slip, drop or vibration and may be maintained indefinitely.

No More Crushed Type or Blurred Pages

Any desired pressure may be obtained without injury to type or illustrations. Under the Birotadruck process half tone illustrations are embossed and the matrice die sunk simultaneously with the moulding operation. The plate cast in the casting box carries a mechanical reproduced embossing, sinking the high lights and raising the deep tones on half tone photo engravings, thus securing the same effect on rotary printing presses as obtained by underlaying cuts and overlaying tympan on flat bed and offset presses.

No Change in Equipment

There are no changes necessary on presses, stereo or other equipment. The Birotadruck Matrice Press and Process takes the place of Matrice Rolling machines and adds refinements and features not heretofore available in matrice moulding.

Either wet or dry mats may be used with full success.

The Birotadruck Press and Process

is the recently perfected European newspaper picture printing process now being used by a number of Continental European Daily newspapers. By this hydraulic press and process clean, deep cut mats are produced in from thirty to forty seconds. The operation is simple and "fool proof" and automatic in control. The American Birotadruck Company has further perfected the original press and it is built to American standards in this country.

Installations have been made on the plants of the New York Times, New York Herald-Tribune, Boston Globe, Dallas News and machines are being built on orders from other metropolitan newspapers.

First in Motor Car Advertising During 1925

During the year 1925 The Detroit Free Press carried 815,522 lines of motor car advertising. This figure represents 40% of the total volume of motor car advertising carried by all Detroit papers, and a lead of 8,492 lines over its nearest contemporary. This leadership in what is really automotive advertising clearly establishes The Free Press as the most able Detroit medium for the advertiser to use who desires to cover the actual buying power of the great market represented by America's Fourth City.

A NEW advertising illustration service has been organized in New York to be known as Morgan & Bierwirth, Inc. Raymond G. Morgan has been associated with the Ethridge Company for many years, as one of their figure men, and John H. Bierwirth, Jr., has been with the Ethridge Company 21 years, the last 10 years as executive manager of the art department. Studios of the new organization will be located at 232 Madison avenue, with an association of artists selected to cover every branch of advertising illustration.

Elmer D. Bergen has been named president of the Bergen Advertising Company, St. Louis to succeed Howard S. Bergen, who resigned Feb. 1, to become associated with the Home Appliance Company. Harry J. Higwein has been elected secretary-treasurer of the Bergen organization.

Percy J. Orthwein has been elected a director of the D'Arcy Advertising Company, St. Louis. Mr. Orthwein began his business career with this agency 12 years ago as assistant art director. He is now an account executive. Other directors of the D'Arcy Company are W. C. D'Arcy, J. F. Oberwinder, Edward Beecher, C. C. Pangman, E. H. Turner and Archie Lee.

Maj. Patrick F. O'Keefe, president P. F. O'Keefe Advertising Agency, Inc., Boston, has been awarded a gold medal by the directors of the Society of American Florists for the slogan "Say It With Flowers," originated by him and so successfully used by florists the country over. The medal is to be presented at a meeting of American florists in New Orleans next summer.

LeBaron Coakley of New York and Boston, has joined the Freeman Advertising Agency, Inc., Richmond, Va. Mr. Coakley is a graduate of the Boston School of Practical Art, the Boston Academy of Fine Arts, and studied at the Art League of New York.

A. J. Olsen, Los Angeles advertising man, has been appointed field manager of Hammel, Sutphen & Freiberg, Inc., a Los Angeles advertising agency. Prior to this appointment he was with the L. S. Gillham Company, holding the various offices of space buyer, production manager, account executive and vice-president. He has been the executive secretary and treasurer of the California Advertising Service Association for the past year.

Leon E. Haynes has been added to the copy staff of the DeForest Porter Advertising agency at Buffalo. He formerly was with the Walz Advertising Agency.

Wimberly-Hubbard Agency, Inc., an advertising concern organized at Fort Worth in 1919, has opened offices at Houston, in the Bankers Mortgage building. The firm is composed of F. W. Wimberly, president; A. E. Hubbard, vice-president, and J. H. Wimberly, secretary-treasurer.

John J. Beck, formerly with the Mumm-Romer-Jaycox Advertising agency at Columbus, O., has joined the Robbins & Pearson Advertising Company.

Co-operative Ice Cream Campaign to Start in June—Remington Arms Wins Cash Register Patents—Federal Commission Objects to Ostermoor Trade-Mark

PLANS calling for investment of $250,000 for a 12-month advertising campaign were adopted Feb. 20 by the executive and advertising committees of the National Association of Ice Cream Manufacturers. The account is being handled by the Gardner Advertising Company, with J. E. Finneran, vice-president and manager of the St. Louis office in charge. Advertisements will appear over the name of the Ice Cream Research Institute.

The Gardner Advertising Company asserts that the ice cream industry makes an annual investment of nearly $6,000,000 for advertising, most of which is placed in the newspapers.

C. G. Morris, of New Haven, Conn., is chairman of the national publicity committee, and V. F. Hovey, Schenectady, N. Y., vice-chairman.

The Remington Arms Company has been established as the chief competitor of the National Cash Register Company in a final decision by the Court of Appeals on the National Company's claim to patents held by the Remington Company.

The National Cash Register Company had sought to compel the Remington Arms Company to make an assignment of cash register patents covering inventions of Frederick F. Fuller, who left the National Cash Register Company to take employment with the Remington Arms Company. Mr. Fuller is known as the oldest cash register inventor in the United States.

The National Cash Register Company employed Mr. Fuller at $5,000 a year under a contract for a year beginning February 17, 1909.

Irenee du Pont, president of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Wilmington, Del., has notified directors of the company he does not wish re-election. It is believed Lammot du Pont, a brother, will be chosen head.

The Beech-Nut Packing Company and controlled affiliated companies report for 1925 net income of $2,099,243 after estimated Federal taxes, comparing with $2,187,600 in 1924. Sales showed an increase of 13.7 per cent over the previous year.

The annual report of the Douglas-Pectin Corporation, including its subsidiaries, the Douglas Packing Company, Ltd., and the Oil Emulsion Corporation, for last year shows net income of $457,-381 after charges, equivalent to $1.52 a share earned on the outstanding 300,000 no par shares of stock. This compares with $383,771, or $1.27 a share earned in 1924.

Net income of the Paige Detroit Motor Car Company in 1925 after expenses, depreciation, interest, taxes, etc., was $2,437,865, against $1,588,085 in 1924. Net sales were $62,763,787, against $57,-679,259, the latter figure representing balance after elimination of inter-company profits. Surplus after dividends was $1,-379,494, against $705,229.

SEITZ ARTICLES DRAW KANSAS COMMENT

Standardization Sending Readers to Journals of Opinion for Information Peterson Tells Kansas Press—Discusses Criticism

The impending danger of the "journals of opinion" superseding the daily newspapers as individualistic media of expression was featured by Elmer T. Peterson, editor of Henry J. Allen's Wichita Beacon, in a dinner address to the Kansas Press Association recently.

He commented upon Don Seitz's strictures on modern newspaper editorial expression and admitted that Seitz's criticism has a basis in present-day tendencies, warning the editors that the young college students of today crave the mental stimulus they find in such journals as The New Republic, the American Mercury, McNaught's Monthly and The Nation. Not finding enough of this stimulus in modern newspaper expression, they turn to sources which too often are destructive in tendency. It would be a calamity to abandon this peculiarly valuable field, he said.

In line with this address was an article by Mr. Peterson in the Saturday Evening Post a week later, commenting upon the present-day vogue for lambasting the booster, with his alleged standardization and conformism and exalting the destroyer. The writer points out that the destructive critics are the ones who are standardized and "mark time with eyes right, waiting for the cue of the top-sergeant," while the builders of the typical "Boosterburg" are diverse and interesting in their methods, contrary to the accusation of the "intelligentsia."

While admitting the faults of the so-called "Babbitt" and hoping for an elimination of banal ritual and by-play in civic organizations, he says that the objectionable type is an exception rather than the rule.

Calles Defends Action in World

President Calles wrote a signed defense of Mexico's policy of deporting foreign born teachers and preachers for the New York World, which that paper published Feb. 25.

"has worked to perfection"

"Last August we installed one of your modern Model Twenty-six Linotype machines and thought perhaps you would like to know how we like the machine. It is all that was claimed for it. We have had no trouble with it whatever and it has worked to perfection since it was installed. After using the machine since August, we cannot see how we ever got along without it. During the Christmas rush we handled advertisements with half of the work it required before. We are setting almost every line of our advertisements on the 26, with an occasional big line set by hand, otherwise the entire forms are machine set. It is a wonderful machine and does the work for us."

A Straight Talk to the Advertiser's Pocketbook

PROBABLY more failures have resulted from unwise selection of mediums than from any other source. And the sum of money absolutely wasted through this cause alone, unquestionably totals millions.

So far as the St. Paul market is concerned, the problem of medium DOES NOT EXIST. The Dispatch and Pioneer Press have solved this most perplexing advertising problem.

It is fundamental that an advertising medium should do the following three things, and the better it does them, the more valuable it is to the merchant.

1ST: Concentrate Upon the Desired Market.

The Dispatch-Pioneer Press does in a remarkable degree. The total net paid city circulation is more than 98% of the estimated number of English-reading families . . . almost 100% coverage.

2ND: Involve a Minimum of Waste.

Morning, evening and Sunday home delivered circulation permits the advertiser to talk to every member of the family regardless of his newspaper preference or what his reading habits may be. The best medium for any advertiser is the one that will enable him to tell his story to the greatest number of his possible customers in their homes.

3RD: Produce Results in Reasonable Proportion to its cost.

The Dispatch and Pioneer Press, either SEPARATELY or COMBINED, offer the lowest rate per line per thousand of home delivered circulation in the Twin Cities. Advertisers in these papers talk to the largest group of St. Paul people that can possibly be reached in any manner and they do it at ONE LOW COST.

AND the unusual reader-interest and reader-confidence of these 12-hour newspapers ADDS strength to every advertisement that appears in their columns.

The ONE Known, Definite, Positive, Steadfast, Unfailing, element in advertising in St. Paul is the certainty of the St. Paul Dispatch and Pioneer Press. If your goods and prices are right, and the time for selling them is right, then good, strong advertising in the Dispatch and Pioneer Press MUST bring you more business.

These papers carry YOUR message to this entire market . . . in the most effective way and at the lowest cost.

The Auto Show Number, published on February 7, carried more than 86,000 agate lines, or 290 columns of automotive and related advertising . . . a very close comparison with such national leaders as the Chicago Tribune and the New York Times . . . 48 columns more than the next Northwest newspaper (a Minneapolis paper).

This emphatically expresses the verdict of national advertisers, who study newspaper values with scientific accuracy; and of local advertisers who know by profitable experience.

INDIANAPOLIS NEWS VETERAN CELEBRATES 50 YEARS' CONTINUOUS SERVICE

W. F. Ellis at the stone on 50th anniversary

WILLIAM T. ELLIS, assistant superintendent of the composing room, celebrated his golden anniversary with The Indianapolis News and rounded out full 50 years of continuous service, Monday, Feb. 15. He reported for work at his usual hour of 6 A. M., closed the starter page of the last edition, and then attended a dinner at the Columbia Club, where executives, editorial workers, advertising and circulation men and members of the printing and mechanical crafts and trades assembled to do him honor.

More than a hundred members of the News organization gathered at dinner to pay tribute to "Bill" Ellis, dean of them all. Meredith Nicholson, Indiana author and novelist, and formerly telegraph editor of the News, epitomized the sentiment of the occasion and the assembly when he said in a message: "Bill Ellis never missed a mail or stung a friend and heaven can ask no more." Louis Howland, editor, William Herschell, the News poet, Curtis Hodges, general manager, Hilton U. Brown, chairman of the board of directors, J. M. Schmid, business manager, Frank T. Carroll, advertising director, Lot Lee, former telegraph editor and Don U. Bridge, manager of national advertising, all paid tribute to Mr. Ellis. Warren C. Fairbanks, one of the owners of the News, sent a congratulatory message to Mr. Ellis.

Mr. Ellis received numerous gifts from his fellow workers, including a watch, $50 in gold, and the coveted diamond button for 50 years' service, the first ever presented by the News.

When "Bill" Ellis came to the News in 1876, at the age of 19 and with still two years to serve as printer's devil, the News was a seven-column, four-page paper, with a circulation of 2,000. It was printed on a flat-bed press, and the composing room staff numbered seven printers. In a half century, Mr. Ellis has seen the News grow to 48 to 60-page editions. The little composing room staff of seven printers has grown to 150, and a battery of seven quadruple Hoe presses has superseded the little flat-bed of 50 years ago. One man composed all the advertisements by hand when Mr. Ellis joined the News staff, now 75 men are required to compose the advertisements for one day's issue.

Mr. Ellis was born on July 18th, 1856, at Smithfield, Fayette County, Pennsylvania, and came with his parents to Indiana at the age of nine. Two years' apprenticeship with the Ladoga Herald and the Noblesville Independent antedated his connection with the News. He has held his present position as assistant superintendent of the composing room for 48 years. He has missed only three weeks from his job, exclusive of vacations. At one time he worked seven years without a single day off.

Three River Paper Mill Starts

Four of the new machines being installed in the International Paper Company's Three River mill were operated for the first time recently. They made the first 10 tons of newsprint at a speed of 800 feet a minute, said to be a record. Joseph Fearing, International's vice-president, denied reports the firm was seeking to buy 1,600,000 acres of New Brunswick timber land as reported by the Fredericton (N. B.) Daily Gleaner, Feb. 24.

Panhandle (Tex.) Herald Sold

Dr. J. R. Nunn and J. L. Nunn, who recently sold the Amarillo (Tex.) Daily News, and David M. Warren, who was managing editor of the News under the Nunns' ownership, have purchased the Panhandle Herald from Lee Satterwhite who is speaker of the Texas House of Representatives. Warren, who is still with the Amarillo News and Globe, will move to Panhandle and take charge of the Herald March 1.

Bathhurst Mill to Double Capacity

The only newsprint mill in the Maritime Provinces of Canada, that of the Bathurst Company Limited, Bathurst, N. B., is to have its capacity doubled. At present it is a one-machine mill of 65 tons output. A second machine of similar capacity is on order and will be installed at the first of next year.

Minnesota Veteran Honored

Frederick Lowell Smith, 82, the oldest printer of Minneapolis, was honored Feb. 11, by fellow printers and the local typothetæ. Mr. Smith went to St. Anthony now Minneapolis, 69 years ago and worked four years on the Falls Evening News. Later he founded the Minnesota Chronicle, weekly, which was absorbed by the Daily Atlas.

New York A.P. Man Dies

Harvey M. Hubbard, 47, an editor in the Latin-American department of the Associated Press, New York, died Feb. 23, of pneumonia. He was a graduate of Syracuse University. Before entering newspaper work in Syracuse he practiced law, representing New York legal interests in Mexico.

EDITOR'S MUMMY HOAX STIRRED WISCONSIN

Scientists and News Men Aroused at "Discovery" But Rusk County Journal Chief Explains It Was Only a "Brightener"

Edward Richardson, editor of the Rusk County (Wis.) Journal, read the tale of the famous moon hoax perpetrated on a gullible public back in the early days of the New York Sun, when it started as a penny paper.

He also read of the hoax that James Whitcomb Riley put over on one of Poe's poems when he claimed that the poem was discovered in the fly leaf of an old school book.

The inspiration that these two stories gave Editor Richardson has now made him the most famous man in Wisconsin over night. For Richardson, drawing upon his prolific imagination, went ahead and invented some narratives that would make even Locke's moon hoax in the Sun and Riley's deception of Poe look mild by comparison. And when he published them in his weekly an entire state was set agog. Dailies and weeklies throughout Wisconsin republished one of the stories giving it wide circulation.

Following is a sample of his mummy hoax:

"The mummified body of a man, encased in the living trunk of a tree . . . dressed in clothes that fell away like ashes . . . holding an old muzzle-loading, flintlock rifle . . . petrified by the sap of the live basswood tree . . . in whose pocket were a few French coins which bore the date 1664 . . . was discovered near Ladysmith, Rusk County, . . . and is to be shipped to the University of Wisconsin at Madison."

This news story, containing all the elements of an exciting tale of adventure, possibly of a gruesome murder, perchance of great historical significance, was published two weeks ago in Richardson's Rusk County Journal, but was credited to the "Rusk County 'Lyre'."

As the story spread, scientists at the University of Wisconsin and curators of the Wisconsin State Historical museum at Madison, Wisconsin, began to investigate the tale and immediately pronounced it a hoax, asserting that no man could be petrified by the juice of a tree, that scraps of paper and clothing could not exist for 250 years undecayed—Richardson had said that a paper found in the clothing bore the date 1664 and the name of a French explorer—and that the whole story must have been spun out of whole cloth.

As investigators and newspaper men began to get hot on the trail of Richardson to determine the verity of his "petrified body" story and of others he had published, he confessed that he manufactured the myths to liven up his newspaper.

"The story of the tree embalming was one of a series of hoax stories which we are publishing under the signature of the 'Rusk County Lyre,' and we intended them for local consumption only," revealed Editor Richardson. "There is nothing to the story beyond what the imagination of the 'Lyre' conceived. No body was found."

GAZETTE SOLD FOR $105,000

St. Joseph Daily Bought by Banker at Trustees' Sale

The St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette, morning daily, was sold at a trustees' sale Tuesday to F. L. Ford, president of the First National Bank and the First Trust Company, holder of the paper's second mortgage bonds.

The price was $55,000, subject to first mortgages and interest amounting to $50,000, making the total of $105,000.

Mr. Ford announced that the paper was purchased for another party whose name will be made known as soon as the property can be legally transferred. There were only three bidders.

"I can unhesitatingly say that the service which you have been giving us on our checking proofs has been very satisfactory. Before taking on your new service we received a great number of requests from agencies asking for missing proofs and we had tried a great many different ways to correct this. We tried your old system of coding the papers and as you know we were not satisfied with that. We then had special envelopes made and marked to the attention of the Checking Department. These were mailed to the agencies and advertisers by first class mail. We thought that this method would assuredly be the best but we still found we were having trouble.

I was at first very skeptical about turning over the entire checking copy situation to your company but since doing so we have found this to be the most satisfactory method we have ever used."

Yours very truly,

STRONG MOVE IN BRITAIN TO BAR DIVORCE DETAILS FROM NEWSPAPERS

Bill Now in Parliament Has Support of Women's Organizations, Churches, and Bar Members—Declare Sex News Undermining Morals

By HUGH J. HARLEY

PROHIBITION of scandalous details in British newspapers concerning divorce and police cases may result from agitation most strongly supported for the listing and passage of a Bill of Parliament providing for the strict regulation of such reports. The Archbishop of York is one of the leading prelates who has not only endorsed the bill but who presided recently at a meeting to open an active campaign throughout the British Isles.

The meeting held in London was largely attended by representatives of religious and civic bodies, and it was noticeable that a great proportion of the audience was composed of women. Scores of clergymen were in attendance.

A resolution was adopted which urged upon the Government the importance of giving facilities for the speedy passage of the measure, stated that the evils complained of were generally admitted and that their abolition was necessitated by law. The measure has the support of the Mothers' Union, The National Union of Teachers, the Council of the Law Society and all the religious denominations.

"This pollution of the public mind by the wholly unnecessary publication of masses of unsavoury details in judicial proceedings where sex matters are involved, is one of the most serious evils with which we have to deal," said the Archbishop of York. "It is constantly increasing and is a matter in which not only the Church but the State has a vital concern. I âm glad to say that the Church of England has not been silent on the matter for the Church Assembly has passed a strong measure of support for the bill, which has been prepared by Sir Evelyn Cecil. I was appointed a member of a Royal Commission to deal with the question and the impression made on the minds of the Commissioners by the evidence which was taken indicated clearly to them the existence of an evil that was undermining popular morals. Figures were presented to show the great amount of space devoted by some newspapers to this sort of 'news' and in one of the leading Sunday newspapers no less than 238 columns of such matter were counted within a year. Evidence also was heard from the president of the Chief Constanbles Association which indicated that publication of such stores and reports of Court proceedings had disastrous effects on young people, particularly those at the age of adolescence.

"I should say that the evil with which we have to cope lies particularly in the insidious suggestion made day after day and month after month by an accumulation of this scandalous testimony. It might be contended perhaps that not one story was indecent of itself, though, this hardly can be maintained in view of the exploitation of these accounts as special 'features.' But it is perfectly demonstrable that the total effect of these articles constantly being printed is to defile the mind and the imagination of the people, and especially of the young. We feel indebted to the managers of most of the newspapers of the country for the exclusion of matter that is really obscene or indecent, but the evil does not lie so much in that as in this continual pressure of sexual suggestion upon millions of newspaper readers.

"So far as I know there is no other civilized country—in Europe, at all events—where the Judge has not either the power to hold such cases in secret or to ensure that only the names of the parties concerned and the results of the case are published. In France, publication of such proceedings is prohibited and yet Paris or so much of it as reads English newspapers can read and probably does read with avidity these sex suits in the British papers. Any foreigner who reads them would be entitled by their prominence and frequency to consider that they are manifestations of the social life of our people.

"There has been objection to this Bill, but in reply to those who would oppose it I can say that this question has not been brought forward by pharisaical puritans but has been pressed by lawyers and public men who regard the present condition as a great public evil which demands public attention and correction. It is time that we determined by the test in Parliament whether there is a really strong public opinion on the matter. It has been said that this bill would violate the freedom of the press, but while that freedom is a great public right, I hold that its abuse becomes a great public wrong.

"The Royal Commission was greatly impressed by the honest and sincere desire of all the representatives of the clean and wholesome newspapers in the country to mitigate the evil. They seemed unanimous in their opinion that it should be dealt with but again and again their representatives pointed out that they were not free but were compelled to act in a way that they would not, of themselves, wish, because of the fierce competition of journals with a less honorable standard.

"The commission was so impressed by the obvious good will of the representatives of responsible newspapers that it refrained from making any drastic recommendations and contented itself with expressing the hope that attention having been called publicly and officially to the evil, the proprietors of the newspapers would do their utmost of their own free will to check the flood of filth."

Sir Evelyn Cecil has announced that he proposes to bring the bill up for acceptance and consideration by the new Parliament.

Writing in John Bull, under the heading, "The Back-door to Blackmail," H. M. Richardson, general secretary of the National Union of Journalists, said recently: "A raging campaign is being waged just now with the object of pushing through Parliament a Bill to clean up the Press. People look at the text of the Bills and see that it is intended to make it punishable to publish any indecent matter. 'Excellent,' they exclaim.

"And their enthusiasm grows when they read further that in any judical proceedings for dissolution of marriage, for nullity of marriage, or for judical separation, the reporter shall be limited to reporting (1) the names, addresses, and description of the parties and witnesses; (2) the grounds on which the proceedings are brought and resisted as set forth in the petition and answer; (3) submissions on points of law; (4) the summing-up of the judge and the finding of the jury.

"Where I differ from the agitators who think they are on the side of the angels is that I believe: (1) that the present law can do all the new Bills aim at doing, and (2) that while the new Bills might preserve the pudity of little people they would open the door pretty wide to blackmail."

PLAN $500,000 PUBLICITY FUND

New England Group to Spend Huge Sum to Attract Visitors

Plans for the spending of $500,000 for publicity to attract summer visitors to New England this coming summer, were discussed in Boston, Feb. 18, at a meeting of various business and hotel men, acting under the auspices of the committee on recreational resources of the New England council, an organization of prominent business men designed to boost New England. What portion of this sum will be spent in paid advertising was not stated.

Discussion of conditions in the various states and examination of the plans proposed for the coming season were the principal features of the meeting, other than the appointment of the following committee to have charge of the publicity campaign: Frank C. Hall, of the Hotel Somerset, Boston, president of the New England Hotel Association; David Daly of Pawtucket, R. I.; T. F. Joyce, publicity director and assistant to the president of the Boston & Maine Railroad, and Miner H. Paddock, Jr., president of the L. C. Smith Typewriter Company of Boston, Massachusetts.

DAILY CUT SOFT COAL PRICES

Philadelphia News Bought Bituminous and Undersold Dealers

A campaign conducted by the Philadelphia Daily News, tabloid, against prices of soft coal has achieved valuable results both to householders and the newspaper.

Soft coal prices rose as a result of the anthracite strike from a normal level of $7 to $8 a ton to as high as $18 and even $20 a ton. The lowest price per gross ton of 2,240 pounds was set by the largest dealers asking $10.64.

These prices were not justified by prices f.o.b. mines. After urging retail dealers to moderate their prices the Daily News went into the spot coal market and bought a low-volatile run of mine bituminous coal which it placed on the market at $8.75 per gross ton, $1.90 under the lowest dealer price and $10 to $12 under the high dealer price.

To do this arrangements were made with a few dealers to receive the coal from the Daily News without charge of any kind, conditionally on dealers agreeing to handle and haul it for $2.50 a ton.

This some dealers undertook to do and the Daily News has taken orders from householders for every ton of the coal it bought in the open market and delivery to householders is now being made.

The campaign was handled for the News by Matthew F. Boyd of the staff, who conducted a similar campaign for the Washington Herald in 1923.

Livestock in New York State Has Increased in Value

A striking development in the livestock industry of New York State in 1925 was the increase in value per head which accompanied the slight decline in numbers of most classes of animals. The value of horses increased $3 a head, while milch cows and heifers over two years old jumped in value $18 a head, going from $62 on January 1, 1925, to $80 on January 1, 1926, or an increase of 29 per cent. All cattle taken together, although declining 2 per cent in numbers, increased in value from $99,028,000 a year ago to $109,920,000 this January. Sheep and swine also showed increases in total value.

The aggregate value of horses and mules, cattle, sheep and swine on the farms of New York on January 1, 1926, was $184,213,000, an increase of 16 per cent during the preceding twelve months, according to the livestock report issued from the New York State Department of Farms and Markets.

This is an added chapter to the evidences of increased prosperity in the Empire State. Other industries, such as manufacturing, commerce, finance and agriculture have set new records, and the increased earnings of the workingmen have exceeded the increased cost of living.

General prosperity has also been evidenced in the record volume of retail sales.

The National Advertiser, with carefully distributed merchandise, will find the daily newspaper his most efficient medium of sales promotion.

HOW A SMALL CITY NEWSPAPER MADE A RADIO SHOW PROFITABLE

Dealer Resistance Overcome When Crowds Applied for Tickets to Ithaca Journal-News Venture Launched Without Merchants' Co-operation

By HOWARD McLELLAN

THE experience of many small cities of 30,000 population or less with radio shows has, in most cases, left an unpleasant taste in the mouths of either the radio dealers or the newspapers which have sponsored them. As a result the belief has become deep seated that the radio show is a big city proposition. Dealers have become reluctant to participate whether the show is their own joint venture or proposed by their local newspaper.

"Folks come to look, listen and leave," the small city radio dealer responds to the newspaper's efforts to interest him in a show.

This was precisely the state of mind of radio dealers in Ithaca, N. Y., when the Journal-News proposed the first radio show in that city a few weeks ago. Ithaca has a population of 26,000 of which one-fifth is made up of students at Cornell University.

The dealers not only felt that the city was too small for a successful radio show but they believed that the show would not be a selling attraction. Furthermore there were other untoward elements working against it.

When Wester W. Baker, advertising manager of the Journal-News, approached the dealers he was bombarded with their doubts.

"It won't sell any radio outfits," they chorused.

"The town's too small," they said.

"Even if you get all the dealers together; even if the town was larger it wouldn't be a success. There's a growing belief among radio users here that radio reception is a failure because the city's in the heart of a belt hit by violent storms. Then again a power house leak seriously interferes with reception," was the final and apparently unanswerable argument.

Baker listened. The final and apparently unanswerable argument gave him his cue.

"If all these misgivings and mis-beliefs are retarding the sale of radio here," he replied, "it's a situation which only our newspaper and a radio show will remedy The show will be held; the Journal-News will promote it and we'll see what can be done to lay this ether ghost.

"We'll do more than that," he promised. "We'll agree to bring nearly every visitor into your stores first so that you may give them a preliminary selling talk. Further we'll bring the same people and their friends to the show where you will have a second opportunity to sell them. We'll make it an intensive selling proposition. For three nights and days people in this community will be centering attention on radio."

In spite of this determined stand and unqualified promises many of the dealers were against it. A few were willing to make the start although this handful did not by any means warrant Baker going ahead with his plans. At least others would not have felt justified in going as far as he did.

The dealers had been approached but had not warmed up to the show idea and were still mulling it over, when the Journal-News announced on its own responsibility that for three nights immediately preceding Thanksgiving it would hold "Ithaca's First Radio Show"; that tickets could be had of "any radio dealer" and that "all the latest in radio equipment and accessories would be on exhibition," plus a fine musical program and speeches and stunts which would be broadcasted from the stage of the hall.

Dealers who read the newspaper's five column-fifteen announcement had no time to click tongues and voice misgivings. The Journal-News appeared on the streets at 3 P. M. At 4 P. M. people were calling upon dealers for Radio Show tickets. That dealers did not warm up to the idea at first is no reflection upon them. For many months they had found the "power house leak" propaganda and had made little headway against it.

The merchandising value of the show began to appeal to them when the demand for tickets was created by a single advertisement. No attempt was made by the newspaper to force the show upon the dealers.

The one dealer who was most adamant in his refusal to participate in the show finally called Baker on the phone. He had held out as long as possible.

"For the love of Mike," he said, excitedly, "send over a couple hundred show tickets. People have been calling for them for two days. Put me down for a booth and send your salesman over with a contract. I never dreamed people could be waked up to radio like this."

The dealers went into the thing almost to a man when they were convinced that there was a latent interest in radio broadcasting which could be awakened by the right stunt.

For months they had carried on direct-by-mail campaigns, had used newspaper space generously and had tried in divers ways to beat down the anti-radio belief. They were skeptical.

The offer of tickets through the dealers brought prospects into the stores who were not on any radio dealer's mailing list in the city.

They came quite willing to hear about radio. Many came who already had radio sets and who had experienced trouble with what they guessed was the "power house" leak, but they were willing to listen to the dealer's selling talk about this or that new improvement which would solve their difficulties.

College radio fanatics brought down home made outfits and replaced them with standard equipment. Interest in the show was so keen that many who called for tickets, before they had been supplied to dealers by the newspaper, called a second time to get them and listened for a second time to dealer's chanteys. For the first time in many a moon radio dealers were busier than merchants in any other line in the city. They were smiling and carrying off to show rooms their best equipment. They spent time and money garnishing their booths.

The dealers had become so enthusiastic that in advance newspaper copy they chorused "Come to the Radio Show—Ithaca's First." Not a dealer referred to his particular line of equipment. The idea of boosting their lines was submerged. Everything was "come to the show." Not until the day of the opening did they begin to stress the merits of their respective stocks. Then, during the show, they exploited their brands in large space.

The exposition hall was filled to overflowing each night. An exceptional program was broadcast. Talent was easily obtained from a local conservatory and other sources. Each member was broadcast through station WEAI at Cornell University and between each number was an intermission of ten minutes during which the audience found itself with nothing to do but inspect the booths.

The total attendance was amazing. The radio show was on everyone's tongue before, during and after the show. The audiences came from everywhere, farmers from the rich agricultural sections surrounding Ithaca; college men and women from Cornell; curious radio fans came from nearby big cities to see what a small city show was like. Professors from Cornell, electrical engineers, and even the men who manned the power houses which were credited with creating the interference ghost, came.

The ether ghost had been laid.

While the radio equipment is not being sold like hot cakes, sales have increased sufficiently since the show to warrant the asumption that the show did it. Dozens of hand-made radios have been brought to light and discarded for more modern equipment and as to the "power house leak" and other nebulous enemies of good radio reception, the show, and the steady advertising campaign carried on by local dealers since, have pretty nigh killed them off entirely.

WORLD MEN DINE

Alumni and Staff Gather in New York and Miami

While 130 New York World men and alumni gathered in New York, Feb. 20, a Florida edition of the yearly spread, minus, however, the music of the World's staff orchestra and the revue of World affairs, was held in Miami. At the latter dinner were Herbert Bayard Swope, John J. Leary Jr., William T. Bliss, in charge of the special Miami edition of this newspaper, and others to a total of twenty. Special entertainment had been provided by Wells Hawkes, formerly of the World, and messages were interchanged between the two gatherings.

J. Earl Clauson, assistant managing editor, was acting chairman at the New York affair in the absence of Mr. Bliss, official chairman. The annual revue was staged by John Butcher, assisted by other members of the staff. The orchestra was directed by William Moss. Through the courtesy of Pathe News, a motion picture review of important world events during the past fifteen years was exhibited.

Each diner received a copy of The Illustrated Overset, the World staff's annual publication, issued this year as a tabloid newspaper and purporting to contain exposes of various members of the staff.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

EXTENDING THE READING PUBLIC

"WE are learning to make newspapers better and better year by year. If you will cast your thoughts back, you will have the conception of the wspaper reader as being the old man, the head of the family; that was his erogative and his distinction. For years we have been extending our reading blic. We have the women reading the newspapers now, especially the vertising columns. . . . The old newspaper confined itself largely to litics and the personalities of its few readers. How many of your acquaint-ces are deeply interested in politics? I will guess, not over 20 per cent. The dern editor is seeking to interest not only all his readers, but those who may come readers."—Col. R. R. McCormick, co-publisher, Chicago Tribune.

THE CHEMISTRY OF ADVERTISING

"DURING the past 20 years, advertising has been taken to college, and educated—it has been psycho-analyzed, tabulated, put through class-m exercises and given all the degrees of army mentality tests. Yet, the most rned university professor, or the most brilliant advertising agency executive, ows but little more of the force back of paid publicity, than the proprietor the village corner grocery who laboriously writes his ad for Saturday specials the back of a piece of wrapping paper. And yet advertising through its ver to reduce the cost of a publication to the reader and through its own ue as an educational factor, has done more to advance the cause of civiliza-n than any other one thing unless it be the invention of printing itself."—nk T. Carroll, advertising director, Indianapolis News.

ERRORS IN NEWSPAPERS

"ERRORS, typographical and otherwise, are the bugbears of publishers. The doctor, it is said, buries his mistakes, the lawyer digs them up and ls that they were not mistakes. The business man hides his mistakes in the ink section of his books. Every error the newspaper man makes, whether it in the composing room or the newsroom, is flaunted before the public for ryone to see. The newspaper, as a business, has about 'as much privacy as a dfish.' Therefore, when you think that your favorite newspaper is making many mistakes, stop and think how much more worried are the newspaper n."—Walter S. Ball, editor, Providence (R. BUSINESS IN

ILLINOIS

HAS GOOD OUTLOOK

Conditions in the mercantile trade and steel industry, the latter with dry goods being considered as trade barometers, are most healthy, with indications of a good business this year, based on the present outlook.

There was an unusually good opportunity of investigating and determining general sentiment on present business conditions and future prospects early this month as there were more than 1,600 merchants in Chicago in attendance at the convention of the Interstate Merchants' Council. Their reports on business were almost unanimously good.

Retailers had a good year in 1925 with satisfactory profits and backed up their report on the latter by making large purchases of goods. This is the best evidence that can be had.

Agricultural implement makers shipped 52.8 per cent more implements to distributors in December than in the same time last year.

You will find products that have been advertised through the Illinois daily newspapers leading the list of sales record producers.

Were you a leader? Or, did you drift along with the tide?

Columbia Students Thoroughly Comb City for News for Daily Newspaper—Stories Written for General Circulation —650 Graduates from Oldest School

By ROBERT S. MANN

Associate Professor of Journalism, School of Journalism, University of Missouri

PROBABLY few cities in the world are so thoroughly combed for news as is Columbia, Mo. A reporting staff of 100 young men and women, and a copy reading staff of 50, come near setting a record for towns of that size—13,000—or for towns of any size.

The earnest workers who make up these staffs are students in the School of Journalism of the University of Missouri, the oldest school of journalism in the world. Six days a week they are busy at least a part of the time with their newspaper work. And six days a week the results of their efforts are read, not only by students and professors, but also by business men, housewives, factory employes, negro laborers, laundresses, farmers and all the other classes of persons who live in Columbia and Boone County.

A daily newspaper, with weekly magazine section, and a country weekly make up the laboratory of the School of Journalism. The daily and its magazine are controlled directly by the school through a corporation of alumni; the country weekly is owned by a Columbia publishing house, which turns over the entire editorial department to classes in country newspaper work and their professor.

One of the major advantages of such laboratories, according to members of the faculty, is that they are all of general circulation, and not mere campus publications. The student writer is forced to consider the news interests and viewpoints of other classes than his own small circle. He is forced to realize that it is not sufficient merely to publish the things that interest him, and that sarcasm directed at some class is bound to be resented and protested. A mistake means not merely a professor's reproof, but real damage done. He is brought face to face with the fact, sometimes to his own surprise, that it really matters whether he does his work well or not.

One should not gain the impression that the students in this school spend all their time at reporting and copy reading, or even at newspaper work in general. A broad education is demanded as the primary essential of a journalist, and each student who receives the degree of Bachelor of Journalism must have had practically three years of general college studies. Many of the best graduates take four years of academic work in addition to their professional courses, obtaining two degrees, Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Journalism. Others spend an additional year in study after graduation and obtain a master's degree.

The student's course will usually follow this plan: The first two years are spent in the College of Arts and Science, either at the University of Missouri or at some other recognized school. He then enters the School of Journalism for a two-year course, during which time he will spend about half of his time on professional courses and about half on advanced academic courses.

During his first semester in the School of Journalism, he will usually take introductory classroom courses. In the second semester he usually gets into active reporting. In the senior year he will continue active reporting for at least a semester, and get actual desk practice in copy reading. One year must be spent in studying the History and Principles (or ideals) of Journalism, a course taught by Dean Walter Williams. The advanced student also has the opportunity to study feature writing, editorial writing, literary and dramatic reviewing, newspaper and magazine departments, etc.

The student who plans to enter small-town journalism finds a series of courses dealing with country newspaper work. The student whose taste runs to advertising may take an advertising course or courses every semester. The art department of the university offers a similar series of courses in newspaper illustration. Most of the courses are conducted on the laboratory plan, with the student's editorials, advertisements, illustrations and the like coming off the press daily.

Academic courses taken include those most likely to be of value in later life—English, logic, sciences, modern languages, economics, history, psychology, philosophy, political science and public law, and sociology. Some students, who plan to specialize as writers on some one topic, seize the opportunity to take several courses in that field.

The school has more than 650 graduates, most of whom are working in some phase of journalism.

A glance through the latest directory of graduates and other former students shows men and women working as editors, managing editors, news editors, city editors, Sunday editors, advertising managers, business managers, editorial writers, press association correspondents at home and abroad, magazine writers, teachers of journalism, writers for and editors of agricultural and trade journals, copy writers for advertising agencies, editors of women's pages and other departments, free lance feature writers, cartoonists, illustrators, sport writers, etc. A number are proprietors of newspapers.

There has been a steady demand for the school's graduates. Two messages received within a few days of each other recently asked for 12 to 14 workers, but only a few could be supplied. A dozen students had completed their requirements at the end of the first semester a few days previously, but nearly all of them had already obtained work.

the Social Register was searched, and Wainwright was decided upon.

The next morning at about 8 o'clock a Packard car drew up and parked near the Gould home on Fifth avenue. A young member of the American staff had hired it and was waiting in it. Winkler was to remain in the office to get the story by telephone, if there was a story, and write it. Of course neither family knew anything about the possibility of elopement.

At quarter to nine a very pretty girl walked down the front steps on the arm of George Gould, carrying a satchel that evidently contained school books. Edith looked perfectly composed. Perhaps they had picked the wrong girl. Together the girl and her father stepped into the Gould roadster and started away with the Packard trailing behind. Edith got off at a mid-town private school, and went inside. The Packard and the American reporter waited.

The father was barely out of sight when the school door opened again, and Edith ran down lightly to hail a taxi. When she sped away, if she had looked behind, she would have noticed a Packard following. At the corner of 46th street and Sixth avenue she left her taxi to join a tall slender boy waiting beside a Yellow cab. Edith and Carroll were on their way towards a secret matrimony, unaware that a man to write the story when it happened was not very far behind. They went to the Pennsylvania station, and took a train to Philadelphia. They were unable to get Pullman seats, and the reporter sat directly behind them. In front was an Italian mother feeding bananas to her child. At Philadelphia they went to the marriage license bureau. Still they didn't tell their names. Edith had given her age, and they had been told that in that State she must have her parent's consent. As they left the American reporter stepped in and questioned the clerk quickly. He told him they had gone to Elkton, Md., a famous Gretna Green.

The reporter caught up with the pair on the street just in time to see them get into a touring car from the windshield of which the driver was removing a "For Hire" sign. He engaged a cab and followed after. But here luck failed him. Close to the Pennsylvania and Maryland border his car had a blow-out. The Gould-Wainwright car vanished in a cloud of dust. But he arrived five minutes after the marriage and by six o'clock had the story complete with hundreds of interesting details over the telephone to Winkler.

Other New York papers confirmed the facts for later editions, but no other could claim as did the American a "personally conducted Gould elopement."

Winkler came to New York from South Carolina. John Temple Graves noted Hearst editor was a friend of the Winkler family. Young Winkler was fascinated by the headlines of the New York Journal. When he decided to go into newspaper work he had the choice of one of two jobs—in the real estate department of the New York Herald or on the news department of the American. This was in 1909. He chose the American and remained with that paper 15 years.

One of the early adventures he had was in 1913 when he went to Canada with other reporters on the famous tour with Harry K. Thaw, after the latter's escape from Matteawan in 1913.

Reporter Finds Missing Child

Irving Lieberman, young reporter for the Brooklyn Times, this week located a missing nine-year-old girl one hour after being assigned to the story, and returned her to her parents while police were conducting a fruitless search. The child, missing from home all night, was said to have been kidnapped by "a man in an automobile." Lieberman interviewed the girl's playmates and finally found her playing in a school yard not far from her home. She had spent the night with a chum. Lieberman had the story "cleaned up" for the last edition, and then notified the police to discontinue the search.

Green Won't Talk When Boston Reporters Can't Show Union Cards

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

BOSTON, FEB. 24.—Because reporters and photographers representing Boston newspapers failed to show credentials of membership in the Boston Newswriters Union, President William Green of the American Federation of Labor, upon his arrival in Boston today in connection with labor matters, refused to allow them to interview or photograph him.

Other members of his party also refused to be interviewed. Green was met at South Station by newspaper men and as a result of his attitude evening papers carried no interviews or photos.

A few years ago the Boston Newswriters Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, was rather strong and had a large membership, but in recent years has been inactive.

LETTERS FROM OUR READERS

Limiting Service

I tried to sell a small town department store proprietor in New York State newspaper advertising for several months. He always turned me down with "I have enough business, as much as I can take care of." (name supplied on request.)

Sir Charles might admonish, "Why waste your time on a 'dud'"?

In your issue, Jan. 9, Mr. Ochs states, "I hope to live to see the day when I can say how much advertising we are going to carry and when that space is engaged, that is as much as we can take."

Do modern business ideals of service call for expansion and increased facilities or restriction? Does the physician say, "I can't operate on this patient for I have all I can do?" Does Henry Ford say, "I have as much as I can handle, we will not try to increase or expand another nickel's worth?" And so on in an endless chain.

Should we boost our business all we can, providing, of course, that certain hard and fast rules are observed in so doing? Should we try to improve our present standards of service to advertiser and reader both?

Fair Treatment in News

To Editor & Publisher: The editorial entitled "One Human Interest Story," in your issue of Feb. 13, greatly interested me. It ought to be pondered by all newspaper writers, editors and publishers.

A reporter discovered and identified a man who had been in hiding, earning his living in a menial capacity, 36 years after a train on which this man was the locomotive engineer had run into an open drawbridge, killing 13 persons. This reporter wrote the story of his find and it was published as a "page one smash." You commend the enterprise, but you ask, "What public purpose was served in exposing and exploiting this man's misery?" What purpose indeed?

I am sharply reminded of two incidents that transpired early in my newspaper career.

I turned in a racy account of a habeas corpus hearing for possession of a child. The proceeding was instituted by a husband and wife, a very young woman. It was resisted by a welfare club that had possession of the infant. It was shown and admitted that the child was born out of wedlock. The welfarers, therefore, contended that the mother was not a fit person to rear it. But it was shown that the mother had gone to a distant city, where she had married a worthy mechanic after apprising him of her past; that both of them were living a normal, decent life, and that he joined her whole-heartedly in her effort to obtain possession of the infant. All that was published of my story was the docket entry: "ExParte John and Minnie Doe, for possession of child; child awarded to relators." The managing editor informed me that "This paper stands for giving a woman an equal chance with a man to retrieve her error. The court has found that this little woman is fit to rear her child; we shall not throw an obstacle in her way." I took off my hat.

Shortly thereafter a newspaper executive told me of the settlement made by him in an unusual libel suit. His paper had published a feature story, reviewing legal executions in a certain city. Among other things it was related that when Federal Union troops occupied that city in the time of the war between the states, the general freed the prisoners then in jail, among them six men charged with murder. The names of these men were given. This story was printed some 30 years after the close of the war. One of these men instituted suit for libel, alleging that after his release from jail he had gone to the western frontier and established himself as a cattle raiser and farmer: that he had lived in that community for 30 years and enjoyed the esteem of his neighbors until this newspaper had paraded his past. His allegations were fully proven, and he recovered judgment for a large sum. The Supreme Court reversed the decision, whereupon the newspaper compromised the case, paying a very substantial sum to end the litigation.

In my youthful bumptiousness I told the executive that his newspaper had been most unjustly treated. Glaring at me, he exclaimed: "Not a d—— bit of it! That man had gone straight for 30 years. We had no right to dig up and expose his past."

I agree with you that such exposures serve no public purpose, no good purpose of any kind. More than this, libel suits occasioned by such revelations cannot be successfully defended either upon the ground of truth or of privilege. There must be a timeliness and a public service in order to the enjoyment of defenses. But I can sympathize with the young man who wrote the story that is the basis of your editorial. Seemingly he was laboring under an hallucination similar to that which possessed me in my cub days. Fortunately, my awakening came early, and ever since I have had consideration for the exposed as well as the exposer.

Converted to "Linage"

To Editor & Publisher: Yours was a very sensible service to newspapers when you dropped the useless "e" out of what was formerly known as "lineage."

Hereafter we will refer to the word as it should be spelled—LINAGE. The word is used frequently in connection with our classified promotion service, and among the 140 daily papers we serve with this important department of our business, we will spell it thus.

Yours sincerely,

John H. Gihon.

Why Papers Get So Much Publicity

To Editor & Publisher: In selling an advertising service to a convention of business men, manufacturers, or dealers in the various industries of the country, does the representative of the advertising agency not only arrange for space, but for press releases and press agent material as well?

Does he not promise to put across the advertising, and tell the representatives of the industry that he will also send special publicity anent that industry to the local papers?

At a convention recently, one of the advertising firms at this meeting described the threefold service which it performed on a recent contract for boosting an industry which I shall not mention, but which touches the life of every reader of Editor & Publisher at some point.

The preparation of "live" copy was mentioned first, as perhaps, the major element of the advertising agencies' service. But considerable stress was laid on the fact that publicity stories were prepared and sent to the papers for use as news stories. Papers printed these, the head of this advertising firm told me, when I questioned him later as to whether he found the average editor averse to running such copy.

I asked if the newspapers did not usually take the position that they sold advertising space, and could not give space to the publicity. He informed me that the "copy" was irresistible, inasmuch as it was always of definite news value and was prepared by cracker-jack newspaper men in the most approved newspaper style. He left me with the remark that 80 per cent of the papers used the publicity stuff sent to them by his advertising agency.

A third phase of his work was lining up some of the men in the industry who came in contact with the consumer by sending them "peppy" letters, or sales talks that would enable them to become better salesmen. With these special talks there would be included copies of the ads being run in the papers as well as copies of the press agent stories which were sent to the newspapers, and which, according to his own testimony, were used by 80 per cent of the papers.

In the talk which he gave to the members of the industry assembled, he said:

"Every industry of any size using newspaper space gets a certain amount of publicity, real estate men, automobile men, etc.

"Your newspaper editor is perfectly willing to give the ——— industry some publicity. He is willing to run articles, but he does not have time to dig up the facts and write them. He might say to you that if you will write up some interesting article, he will run it.

"Furthermore, if there is any local condition that comes up and you are an advertiser and a customer, the editor will always protect you, as his customer."

These were two very interesting points brought out anent the newspaper business by a large advertising agency of the West. Such is the way newspapers are used (or abused, would you say) by the agency.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

GAYLORD M. FULLER holds a clinic on the American press in the American Mercury for February. After feeling its circulation pulse and examining the advertising coating on the tongue he has jumped to the conclusion that the American press is suffering from paralysis.

When he puts the New York papers on the operating table he has no hesitation in saying that the knife ought to be applied, in spite of many complications and cardiac troubles. Here is a cutting from the article:

The newspapers of New York, indeed, all exhibit marked symptoms of a complication of paresis and cardiac enfeeblement. The infection of prosperity has not only softened their moral fibre, it has weakened their hearts, so that the murmur of leaky valves is distinctly audible. For if the soul of a paper is conviction and singleness of purpose, its heart is faithful and fearless reporting. There can be no real newspaper without news, and there can be no news without reporters to gather it. Good reporting is now fast becoming as obsolete as liberty. News is not the obvious but the true, and truth lies at the bottom of a well. It is the duty and the delight of a first-rate reporter to discover it and bring it to the surface—but in these days the reporter is content to sit on the curb and speculate as to what lies in the nether darkness without risking the dangers of the damp descent.

Mr. Fuller has a paragraph or two about "handouts" which the Lazarian reporters take from the rich magnate's table to distribute as crumbs to the patrons of their papers. He is very strong in his assertions that these handouts are not bread but buncombe.

After examining the news symptoms he does not find that the newspapers are doing as well as could be expected. In fact, he finds this critical situation:

While lack of initiative at the top and the prevalence of handouts have thus destroyed enterprise in news-getting, another influence has spoiled its written presentation. The telephone, in spite of its marvelous aid in the swift collection of news, has been poisonous to lively and truthful reporting. It has separated the writer from his subject. No rewrite man, taking the facts over the telephone, no matter how brilliant and skilful he may be, can possibly give to a story the same flavor of reality that it can get when written by the man who saw it with his own eyes. He is serving warmed-over victuals, and no garnishment of rhetorical parsley or paprika can give them the taste of freshness.

In examining the work of reporters this doctor of the press finds that they have suffered a terrible relapse. His diagnosis is expressed as follows:

One hustling, determined, inquisitive reporter is worth more to a newspaper than a dozen solemn pundits in the editorial room, but what chance has he to distinguish himself in a day of predigested news and editorial paralysis? Formerly New York was the goal toward which every ambitious young reporter in the provinces might his way. To work on a New York newspaper was an once an honor and an opportunity. It meant higher pay and further training in the most competitive and most highly satisfying sort of journalism. The New York papers profited by drawing the very best men from the interior—men who had been trained in the splendid school of the small paper of the small town. Their knowledge was practical and experimental, not theoretical. Now all of it is of the past.

In conclusion Mr. Fuller mentions several causes of decay as he sees them. He has diagnosed a New York evening paper as being petrified by Philadelphia sclerosis while several others are suffering from sleeping sickness. But worst of all he mentions the fungous and parasitic growth of the tabloids.

But one searches through the article in vain for suggestions for a therapeutic treatment or a proper disinfectant on the supposition that the author's diagnosis of the American press is correct.

THE current issue of Oregon Exchanges—a magazine for the newspaper folk of the state of Oregon—is put out as an annual directory of the Oregon periodical press.

E. W. HOWE has just mailed his subscribers the December issue of his monthly—devoted to indignation and information.

This latest issue has considerable indignation for newspaper workers (see page 2) but wants information about advertising men in general and one in particular.

Who is the man who writes the advertising for Colgate's shaving soap? He is a genius, and I want to know his name.

This fellow teaches as well as amuses me. I learn from him that Scipio Africanus was the first man who adopted the custom of shaving every day, a fact heretofore hidden in Pliny's natural history book.

If this clever advertisement writer works for N. W. Ayer & Son, noted advertising agents, his efforts should be signed: "N. W. Ayer & Son, by John Taylor" (or whatever his name is).

There are so many men of genius in advertising these days that it is a shame for them to hide. They are gay deceivers, but we are all learning to applaud that in this liar age. No statesman lies as agreeably or cleverly as do the advertisement writers.

Are you tired of newspaper, book and magazine writing, with its repetitions, absurdities and meanness? Then turn to the advertisements for something new and clever.

THE latest booklet to come from the School of Journalism at the University of Missouri bears the title "Recent Books for Journalists" and is from the pen of Besse B. Marks, B. J.

The booklet first lists the volumes which deal with the business office and then those that deal with the editorial office. One of the most valuable sections is that which lists the reference books that are most useful in newspaper offices. Several errors are noticed in the "Publishers' Directory" with which the pamphlet concludes. That list should have been checked a trifle more carefully. The chief value of the pamphlet, however, can be found in the other lists which show careful editorial work.

A copy of this pamphlet may be obtained upon application to Walter Williams, Dean of the School of Journalism, University of Missouri, Columbia, Missouri.

A CLOSE-UP of Arthur Brisbane appears in Collier's Weekly for Feb. 20. Samuel Crowther is responsible for it.

This close-up shows the following background of Brisbane's desk:

At four o'clock in the afternoon the late newspapers reach the desk of Arthur Brisbane in the offices of the Evening Journal—just as the homeward crush starts across the Brooklyn Bridge above. These newspapers do not really reach the Brisbane desk—nothing has reached that desk for years. For on it are newspapers, books, letters, drawings, and memoranda two feet high. The top layers are fresh looking. The bottom ones are yellowing.

Whether the desk is a flat-top or a roll-top and what it is made of are things for the archeologist to determine. An arm's length back from the desk rises another paper mountain, and, in the narrow canyon between, Mr. Brisbane has a chair, a dictating machine, and a telephone.

The caption for this close up of Mr. Brisbane is "The Richest Hired Man." The following "flash" gives Brisbane's answer to the question, "What is the purpose of a newspaper?"

It is, first, to stimulate thought; that's the only really important thing that anybody does.

Second, to give information and direct the mind of the reader in a useful path.

The daily newspaper should work as nature works in irrigation. Nature drops the water one drop at a time. Even the weakest root can absorb it. Newspapers, if they did their duty would drop information in millions of drops every day, suited to the tired brain, or the lack of brain. A newspaper with a million circulation ought to contain a million facts.

Mr. Brisbane also states a few facts about his financial agreement with Mr. Hearst. He left a $15,000 a year job with Joseph Pulitzer and went to the Evening Journal for $8,000. The Journal at that time had a circulation of 40,000. Mr. Brisbane suggested that when its circulation reached a half a million he should receive $50,000. But Hearst did not like that arrangement and substituted an agreement which added $1,000 to Brisbane's salary for each 10,000 of increased circulation—paid faithfully and without a word for each 10,000 of circulation until Mr. Brisbane quit the arrangement himself.

Among the other interesting facts shown in this close-up of Mr. Brisbane is that he keeps five secretaries constantly on the jump, that one-third of the population of this country reads his "Today" column, that this column takes less than forty-five minutes to prepare, and that he once wrote forty of his two column Evening Journal editorials in a single day because he expected to be away from the office for over a month.

LAWRENCE F. ABBOTT has a new outlook on schools of journalism. It will be found in the current issue of The Outlook in an article in which he takes back many of his observations made in a previous issue about the teaching of journalism in American universities.

8,000 Attend Danville Commercial-News Exposition

More than 8,000 people attended the first radio show in Danville, Ill., staged recently by the Commercial-News of that city.

The paper issued a special radio section with the opening of the show and required the exhibitors to take advertising in order to be eligible to purchase exhibit space in the show.

A feature was the building of a mammoth radio, some 20 feet long and standing 7 feet from the floor. A loud speaker 15 feet high was constructed beside the radio and singers and other entertainers appeared in person in the bell of the big loud speaker while an orchestra was mounted on the top of the radio proper.

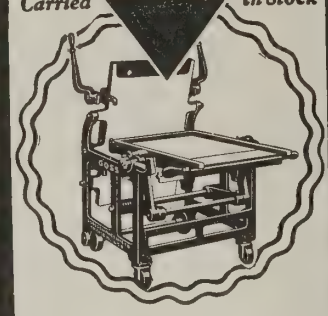
The entire venture was a success according to Arthur E. Price, advertising manager of the paper. This is the second industrial exhibit staged by the Commercial-News within a year, the first being a building show last spring.

RADIO FOR LEAGUE WRITERS

New Assembly Hall at Geneva to Have Latest Broadcasting Equipment

Plans of the League of Nations to provide press accommodations for the forthcoming deliberations are contained in a statement made by Sir Eric Drummond to Eric H. Palmer, assistant to the president of the Freed-Eisemann Radio Corporation, Brooklyn, N. Y., and announced by him this week.

Sir Eric said:



"One problem which occupies us at the moment is the provision of proper wireless transmitting facilities for the new Assembly Hall. This building, which is being planned for a capacity of the representatives of 65 nations with some 1,000 journalists, will undoubtedly be the centre of some of the most important of international debates. Every effort is to be made, therefore, to make it thoroughly modern in all respects, particularly as regards loud speakers, acoustics and radio."

THIS is the seventy-fifth anniversary for the manufacture of ice cream for commercial purposes. Be prepared and capitalize on the anniversary event when the summer weather increases the demand for this product. Play your manufacturers.—Lewis Hyman, Logansport (Ind.) Pharos-Tribune.

How many individual want ad accounts has your paper had during the past six months or the past twelve months? It would be very interesting to tell about the number of individuals and firms who have used your want ads, and it would help you in getting more want ad business to run such a story.—Frank H. Williams.

Once a week the Milwaukee Journal runs nearly a page of small uniform ads, similar to the classifieds, with the following caption at the head: "Name It. Milwaukee Firms Can Supply You. The following are leaders in their lines." Then follows nearly 250 firm names arranged in an alphabetical list according to trades, such as accountants, florists, insurance, laundries, optometrists, etc. It is a good way to increase advertising revenue from small firms who find large amounts of advertising unprofitable.—Wilbur Polson, Milwaukee.

Get a list of the babies born, feature the new arrivals once a month, and box your greetings with advertisements from the various department stores, who will be only too glad to make known their baby supplies and their gifts for infants.—R. L. Lurie, Grove Hall, Mass.

Why not have a "Get Acquainted Reception" in your paper for the new firms that have started in business in your city during the past six months? Get firms that are located near the new concerns to run advertising greeting the newcomers and wishing them success. Get wholesalers who sell goods to the newcomers to run advertising of the same sort, and couple all this with stories telling how important it is for the prosperity of the city to have new firms starting in business in the city all the time. This would bring in some extra advertising and be a good thing for the paper.—F. H. W., Santa Ana, Cal.

Featuring "The Modern Office"—furniture, appliances and stationery—a page of ads from printers, stationers and office outfitters was obtained recently by a northwest paper.—C. M. L.

If your paper prints a style letter watch it for mention of the latest in apparel and accessories of various sorts. Then give your department stores the opportunity of tying up with the letter in case they have the articles mentioned in stock or are expecting them in soon.—E. D. Shaffer, Albuquerque, N. M.

Anniversaries are usually good for extra space. In your rounds among the smaller stores find out when the merchant opened, jot this down on a card and file in a card index holder according to dates. As an example, taking out cards under date of "26" you find which merchants began business on that date or about that date. By keeping cards in this manner you can suggest to merchants a month in advance that an anniversary event should be held—with extra copy, of course.—L. G. D.

FINANCING ST. LOUIS TABLOID

$150,000 of $300,000 Capitalization Now Paid In, Goldman Declares

Joseph Goldman, who is promoting a tabloid daily for St. Louis, said this week that the company had been incorporated under the laws of Missouri, with $300,000 capital stock, of which $150,000 is paid up now, with an additional $50,000 to be paid in before the first issue of the paper is out, which is expected to be March 15.

Mr. Goldman is president of the new corporation; O. Rex Coile, vice-president, and Hampton Rothwell, is attorney and secretary. Mr. Coile, formerly with the St. Louis Republic and now in advertising and publicity work, will be editorial director.

Mr. Goldman has been in newspaper work in Jefferson City.

The new paper will be known as the St. Louis Daily News. Arrangements have been made for the Graphic Feature Service, and International Newsreel Photographs. Benjamin & Kentnor have been made foreign advertising representatives.

A newspaper office in the middle west has on file and available for public use a library of books on the history of newspapers, the printing art and printing machinery. This library is surprisingly well patronized and if not actually a circulation getter, has proved a circulation keeper.—R. E. Dietz, Battle Creek, Mich.

Watch the old furniture sales in the classified columns. Once in a while you will dig up a real relic with a page one story behind it. And incidentally, don't overlook the chance to check up at auction sales with some of those attending to discover if they read about it in your newspaper.—B. A. T., Springfield, O.

Beginning with March, a monthly Planting Guide is a good feature. Interview seedsmen, nurserymen and dealers in plants. It can be worked up into a good feature and will draw readers to the Garden Page.—A. N.

"Just the Gist" is a half-column of telegraph briefs, of not over three lines each, with the name of the town, a dash, and no date. Sometimes you can work up a great deal of interest in your section of the state by giving the readers—who are all in a hurry nowadays and want things quick—a ready and easy-reading five-minute guide to what's going on in their section.—Norman W. Ralston, Urbana, O.

Under the two column box head, "Its a Funny Old State," the Milwaukee (Wis.) Journal, publishes each Sunday a collection of the funniest, the most unusual, the most human, or the weirdest happenings of the week in about a dozen cities of the state. Some stir up laughter, others draw tears.—Ruben Levin, Madison, Wis.

"Funny stories of the phone service" is a subject that can be worked up into an interesting feature. This can be handled from the point of view of the telephone subscribers and also from that of the operators at Central. Chief Operator can tip you off to something at that end of the line, and a little inquiry among business men will give you leads for stories at the other end.—C. F. Lamb.

The advertising columns offer a fertile field for the resourceful city editor, particularly the classified advertising columns. Recently, a Rochester young man advertised in the "want ad" columns for "an attractive young lady to take to the Cornell junior prom." Of course, this was worth a good follow-up on the youth of to-day and modern methods of courting. Recently, a Boston paper carried the following in its advertising columns: SOMEWHAT BORED YOUNG MAN who has tried travel, study, literature, business and love, seeks diverting employment; will undertake anything unusual; salary least important factor. Address A 8496—Herald Office.—J. R. C.

PROSPERITY AND

THE SOUTH

ARE SYNONYMOUS

When we realize what has been done in Southern business achievement during the past generation, when we consider what the South has accomplished in every line of human endeavor, we can then look forward to a growth during the coming years which will far surpass the prosperity of the present.

This greater prosperity is a golden opportunity for the distribution and sales promotion of any worth-while merchandise that is manufactured for the use of the Southern people.

The presentation of your product should be made in a personal manner.

There is a double-barreled personal appeal in newspaper advertising. One is the intimacy and confidence that the daily papers inspire in their readers; the other is the consumers' acceptance of the advertised offerings of the local dealers as something that has been put in stock for the fulfilment of their requirements.

The quality and service of the local daily newspapers and merchants are the two greatest factors necessary for the successful conduct of civic affairs. These same two agents are necessary for the proper survey of any trading territory, so essential to the complete preparation of a merchandising campaign.

Newspaper service includes merchandising cooperation

Florida Rediscovered

Written by MARLEN PEW

FLORIDA represents the strangest social and economic phenomenon in American history.

For four centuries the civilized world has regarded the finger of land that divides the Gulf of Mexico from the wide Atlantic as a "Fountain of Youth" and depository of fathomless wealth, the two great lures of humanity, throughout time. From Ponce de Leon's historic adventure through the centuries to the day when the late Henry M. Flagler backed with millions his vision of a railroad through jungle and over perilous sands, a few men have had faith in Florida, but to the great world it remained but a shadowy dream. No process of nature, during the white man's occupation, has altered the land to make it more or less desirable as a habitation or as ground upon which to build. Like a forlorn bride, bedecked with orange blossoms, poinsettia and richly scented hibiscus, with glittering dowry at her call such as modern man has never looked upon, Florida has stood waiting at the church for 400 years.

In the cosmic sense, the peninsula at the southeast corner of the Union has just been discovered. It has been suddenly revealed, in typical American style—with a rush. A combination of favorable circumstances account for the migration of more than a million persons to the state in a single year. General prosperity gave families all over the nation surplus wealth and the independence which goes with it. Following the war monied Americans increasingly accepted the popular European notion that both Winter and Summer recreation contribute to the full life, added to which is the circumstance that such is the intensity of modern business or professional life that escape ultimately becomes not only a natural yearning, but a human necessity for those who play for large stakes. For thousands the exotic call of sunshine lands is irresistible. Transportation abruptly opened the way, not so much by rail, as in this instance vaunted American railroad enterprise was sadly wanting, despite the magnificent daring of Flagler's pathfinding, but over new hard-surfaced roads on pneumatic tires. The Brooklyn grocer's Lizzie made the trip in a week, while the plain or fancy Wall Street broker's six or eight-cylindered shiner might roll to Jacksonville in 70 hours.

The great lure of Florida, the true explanation of her amazing recent development. Such stucco houses, richly ornamented with exotic shrubbery, roofed with colorful tile, cool under awnings, delighting the eye, making real the dream of the average American woman, are scattered all over the state.

To hundreds of thousands Florida beckoned as a land of promise, opening opportunity to quickly make or repair fortunes, while in the romantic pose of the pioneer. It presented an undeniable attraction to the frenzied spirits that feed on chance speculation, uncouth gentry having their rightful place in the diagram of favorable circumstances, since it was their audacity that set the land rush in motion. Essentially, the Florida discovery of 1923-1926 is based upon a tardy general appreciation of sound social and economic advantages and the real pacemaker is now and for four years has been paid advertising.

The Florida development might be termed the new imperialism. This conquest of new soil for the feet of men is adding incalculable treasure to the wealth of the nation. The advance guards of the invading army were commercial propagandists, followed by speculators. The heavy artillery are road-building tractors, sand-sucking dredges altering the handiwork of the waters of the ocean and gulf, as they have receded during the centuries, trimming their ugly shores and making thousands of acres of new land with joyous sea views for home sites and city water fronts, a new type of manufacturing accomplished in this day by such genius as that of D. P. Davis, of Tampa, whose dreams of clean islands dropped at the doorsteps of great cities to relieve congestion and furnish maximum comfort and beauty, today are realized.

Indeed, the generals of the invading army have been engineers and builders and the chief provisioners have been creative capitalists such as Barron G. Collier, now developing nearly two million acres of land in a county bearing his name; William J. Conners, the veteran Buffalo publisher, hero of the Everglades and builder of its 30 miles of concrete road, 22 feet wide, skirting the eastern shore of Lake Okeechobee; August Heckscher, Harvey Firestone, Otto H. Kahn, David Warfield, T. Coleman du-Pont, Henry Ford, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and dozens of syndicates of New York, Chicago, Washington, Cleveland, Detroit, Western and Southern developers and a host of able newspaper men whose amazing stories are related elsewhere in this number. The statement has been made that outside interests paid $400,000,000 for land in Florida in 1925. This figure represents many turnovers of the same properties.

A shoestring has been a good enough starting point in Florida for a man who knew how to climb. The business in hand is making cities, creating farms, opening roads, building railroads in double track to replace the single lines that Flagler laid while ticker-tape railroad operators smiled, the clearing of the land of wild tropical growth accumulated through centuries, widening streets, draining marshes, fertilizing sandy spots, erecting schools, churches and clubhouses, beautifying beaches and lakes, re-arranging palms, laying sidewalks, building stucco villas or workmen's cottages, rearing lofty skyscrapers and immense hotels, dredging channel harbors and fashioning turning basins, erecting bridges, one being the longest in the world, chopping down forests, reclaiming lowlands, financing these undertakings, feeding and housing the workers, keeping every one happy by all known artifices from the band in the park to gala occasions when everyone turns out for play, newspapering on a big scale with advertising flowing like water for all who can make a circulation showing, opening stores for the sale of classy merchandise worthy the purse of the leisure class and of the suddenly rich, and catering to the surging throng with all that human nature calls for.

Florida set out to make, as if over night, an American Riviera. Now she proposes to back it with an agricultural development of startling dimensions.

How great has been the building boom? Building permits granted in 1925 totaled more than $200,000,000. In August alone they amounted to $24,722,820 in 19 cities and in September to more than $27,000,000, according to official figures.

Florida property has an assessed valuation of $580,000,000 and it is officially asserted that the real valuation is around four billions. Inceased values since 1912 are represented as having averaged 16 per cent per year.

The state has nearly 9,000 miles of improved roads and as this writer covered 1,400 miles by motor car in nine days

Cluster of grape-fruit, grown on the Indian River. Florida has 80,000 acres in grape-fruit trees.

Turn me upside down, for my reflection is as fair as my form. Cocoanut palms that clothe a point of land on Tarpon Bend, New River, near Fort Lauderdale.

In the Lake District of Pasco County, land of hills and glistening opal lakes, fertile acreage awaiting the man with the hoe. This view is typical of millions of acres of Florida countryside concealing wealth possibilities equalling those of the realty developments.

there is no room for debate in this story about road quality. There are stretches of narrow, brick highways in the north that can be easily and safely negotiated at moderate speed, all soon to be replaced by wide concrete roads, many now in course of construction. Ruts, sometimes more like chasms, embroider the edge of the brick.

There are thousands of miles of as fine roads through the state and on both coasts as exist anywhere, and there are patches of about as terrible sand and clay roads as one might wish to avoid. The road development in three years is an engineering triumph.

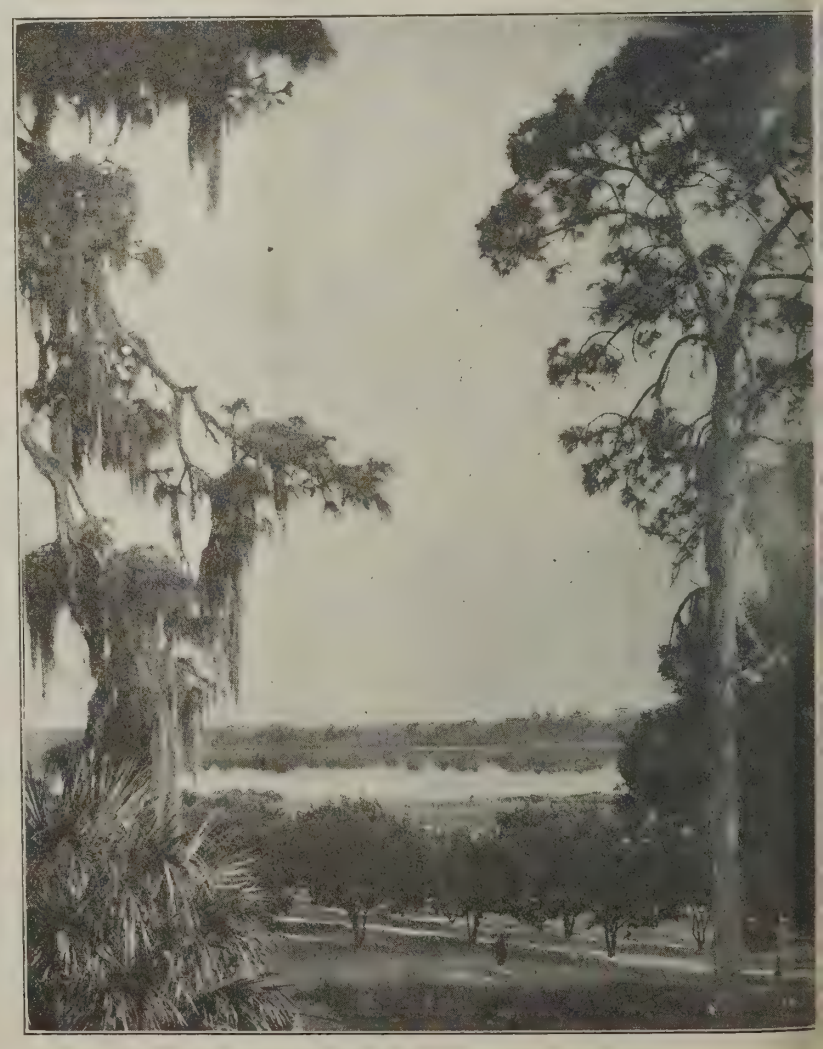
As the traveler passes along through the country he sees allotments on every hand. Street signs are up and sidewalks built, a huge ornamental entrance is in place, but there is only an occasional house. In instances bare allotments are far removed from settlements as to seem like wild dreams. Will they ever build up?

Some "future cities" on Long Island, known to this writer, seem equally visionary. The dream may not be so wild, proved by the fact that from nothing cities have been built in two or three years in Florida. Up they have jumped and in have poured the people! One realizes, of course, that there have been some impudent frauds on the public in Florida, but it would be stretching the point to fail to say that there is no state where credulous people have been exempt from the wiles of real estate sharpers. Florida frauds have indubitably been foisted upon the public through advertising. These are "lot" properties in isolated locations or in swamp districts. Inaccessible farms and building lots have been sold. The "truth in advertising" slogan of the Better Business Bureaus is in the breeze today. The clean-up is under way. The "binder boy" has disappeared. "Binder boy" it should be explained is the local sobriquet for the feverish gentleman who put down his hundred to bind a ten thousand dollar bargain and resold at a thousand profit within 24 hours, perhaps to witness the re-transfer of the property among other "binder boys" half a dozen times before the abstract and title job could be forced through the glutted probate offices. His work is done in Florida. Often he succeeded in bidding land to absurd heights. Sensible Floridians wearied of him and by a concerted attack gave him such a sour dose of losses, through various devices such as the sudden speeding of real estate transfer offices and by cutting prices of adjoining land, that he presently lost all interest in royal palms and bathing beaches and made his way to cooler climes.

The stories of the peak days of 1925, of fortunes made over night with trifling investments, seem unbelievable to northern ears. Allowing for state pride, general boom excitement and the natural tendency of the pioneer to tell a good story, a residue of amazing fact remains, forming perhaps the most sensational land rush story in American history.

The buying and selling crush continued throughout the summer of 1925 and in modified and much more stable fashion continues unabated today. The Floridian tells you that he is devoutly thankful that the buying panic is over. If there is any truth in the Northern rumor that "the bottom has fallen out of the Florida boom," this writer is deaf, dumb and blind. The whole state is buzzing with the excitement of building and planning and real estate offices seem centers of activity. The speculative fever has doubtless subsided, responsible trading continues, advertising is increasing, structural work progresses and the crowds are infinitely better provided for by new housing facilities than during the last Summer and Fall. Along the roads the visitor sees the inevitable announcement of land sales, accompanied by noonday barbecues, and one of the commonest sights is the auctioneer on the block, surrounded by people who are bidding in land. There are a surprising number of women at these sales. In the city real estate emporiums, often dressed up like palatial drawing rooms, there are orchestra concerts and lectures in the afternoon and evening. The big story in Florida is told in response to the question: "Did you get in on that so-and-so, and how much were you offered for yours?"

One of the exciting diversions of the Floridian, better by far than cross-word puzzling, is guessing the dollar value of the annual Winter migration from the North. A tourist, whether he comes i private railroad coach or steers his cour down the Dixie Highway at the wheel a creaking flivver, has a hoof value to th state incomparably greater than ar other live stock commodity, to indulge crude verbal figure. The tourist comes t see, drink in the salubrious air, gratif the sense of taste with rare tropical food renew youth by playing the games children, buy baubles—perhaps to fa under the magic spell of natural glori and stake out a home or farm site an join the builders.



There are no reliable statistics to sho the number of tourists that have r mained in Florida during the past fi years as permanent residents, but th permanent migration is indicated by comparision of the 1920 Federal censu and the Florida state census of 192 which shows the increase to have be 295,079, or 30.4 per cent. Florida present resident population doubtless ex ceeds 1,300,000. The official 1920 cou was 968,479. The big influx has be during the past 12 months.

But, in addition to the permanent pop lation, there is to be considered th transient Winter invasion. It is concer ing this that the figuring wags sharp their pencils. Having no definite infc mation one man's guess is as good another's.

All over the state the investigator solemnly assured that the tourist busine of Florida in 1925 included 2,000,000 vi itors, a nice round sum for any one play with as an index figure.

This "2,000,000" figure is supported an investigation made by officials of t State Chamber of Commerce who made count on certain bridges, highways, ra roads, steamship docks and other sta entrances for a given period and decid that the human influx from the North w at the rate of approximately 6,000 p day, which may or may not be entire satisfactory evidence of travel over t year, as the good gentlemen of t Chamber freely admit.

If 2,000,000 should be the tourist nur ber, just what would that mean in dolla

Typical landscape in central Florida, where orange groves touch the shores o purple lakes, and live oaks and pine trees stagger under the flowing drapery of sombre Spanish moss.

The inevitable municipal band concert, to be found in city and town, with concerts both afternoon and evening to add another joy to life. The scene depicted here is in ravishingly beautiful Williams Park, St. Petersburg.

to the state, asks the statistical hound and the pencil begins to dance.

Well, here is the sum of the wildest optimist:

2,000,000 persons

26,000,000 persons-weeks
7 days per week

$1,820,000,000 total tourist revenue

Crazy! Uncle Sam paid, 107 years ago, $5,000,000 for the whole of Florida, and many of the patriots of the time felt "stung." A billion, eight-hundred and twenty million in tourist revenue, did you say? Why that would be six times greater than the Coolidge tax cut for 1926. It would nearly equal the total value of the manufactured products of Indiana, according to the last census! Be reasonable!

All right, say the number of tourists is only a million, the average time spent in the state is a month, and the average daily expenditure of each person is $5, all quite absurd (with emphasis upon the five-dollar-a-day item) and you have as the annual tourist revenue $150,000,000, nothing to sneeze at, forsooth!

It is possible that a man traveling in a flivver, with a folding bed lashed to the running-board, buying cheese and crackers, canned milk, paper shell pecans and fruits along the road, might live on $5 per day, including oil and "gas." It would be an unenviable venture. But any ordinary traveler can live in excellent style on $10 to $20 a day, according to taste and skill, which approximates traveling cost anywhere in this country or over the beaten paths of Europe. Plutocrats may spend hundreds a day in the luxurious resorts of the coast cities and do no violence to taste or judgment or justify scandalous remarks about Florida's cost of living, for the overhead expense of palatial hotels are as high as $8 per room, per day, for 365 days per year, with a season of only 13 weeks per annum as the basic revenue factor. Naturally such rooms are priced high.

Florida supports 14,520 hotels, restaurants and apartment houses which are let out as living quarters for tourists in the season, besides camp-grounds for automobilists encountered on almost every road.

The 2,000,000 tourist figure is believed by this writer to represent one of the amiable exaggerations of the Florida zealot, but that the state was visited in 1925 by more than 1,000,000 people drawn from the whole world's populated surface, there appears to be no doubt.

The official published statement of the State Chamber of Commerce is that the 1925 tourist trade was worth $150,000,000 to Florida.

Undeniably, the annual visitation of sightseers and thrill seekers has been Florida's chief industry until the great land boom started and then the realtor stepped firmly to the center of the trade stage. How vast has been his operations may never be known. The official estimate is that during last year outside investors spent in Florida land an average of $1,250,000 daily which, if accurate, meant a total turnover during 312 week days of 1925 of $490,000,000.

Banking is an illuminating and dependable index to any community's material well-being and Florida figures are astounding. On June 30, 1925, the date of the most recent bank statement, deposits in the national and state banks of Florida aggregated $575,758,195, which to be appreciated must be compared with the total of denosits of 1920 which were $199,589,122, a growth of 250 per cent in banked wealth in five years.

An aggregate of half a million bank deposits in Florida means a per capita deposit of around $450. The average individual bank deposit for the whole country for the year ending June 30, 1925, was $396.

June of any year is the least favorable month for a Florida showing. It is not to be supposed that many of the wealthiest seasonal residents were carrying heavy deposits there on June 30. So, as a matter of fact, Florida bank deposits of the present time would exceed the figure quoted here by many millions.

When people settle in Florida what do they find to do?

If they are old, infirm or lazy, and have money, they loaf, as in other places; if able and willing they work. They work by Summer and Winter and unless some 200 odd very nice people who were interviewed by this writer are counterfeit and lost to all sense of honor, the months from June to September, far from being unbearably hot, are comfortable and workable. They tell you that sunstrokes are unknown in Florida. A citrus rancher, who had no reason to stretch his story, said: "We work every day in the year in the fields, but not as Northerners work. No straw hats here—felt, drawn down over the eyes. No cotton shirt—wool, my friend, for comfort and health." All declare that the nights are cool. Indeed, the short cut to your Floridian's peak of indignant eloquence is to insult his summer. Northern softies, here and there, were heard to suggest that there was such a thing as sitting under the shade of a banana or cocoanut palm, by the side of a lake, with one's feet up, or, indeed, to make an occasional dash to the mountains of the Carolinas, as New Yorkers flee to the Catskills and Adirondacks, but not so the native born.

A gob beholds St. Petersburg's new deep-channel harbor, nearing completion, pride of the state.

The biggest laugh of two weeks was on a Northern import who told a crowd of Miamians, in scientific detail, how a fellow could keep the temperature agreeable by sitting on the south side of a suspended wet sheet with the wind blowing from an electric fan installed on the north side. Ha, ha, so's your old man! The health record of the state is among the nation's best.

If you have a gun you may shoot a wild cat or a duck in Florida. Please don't shoot a pelican or stork! The air is full of colorful birds. If you own a fishing rod you need scarcely bait the hook to heave monsters from fresh or salt waters which, held up to a camera, would startle every friend north of the Mason and Dixon line. There are 600 registered varieties of fresh and salt fish in these waters, and sea foods shipped from Florida last year were worth $15,000,000.

There are 3,000,000 acres of inland water, hundreds of charming lakes and streams, fringed by exotic vegetation. Most men build a garage behind the pretty stucco home and nearby a boat house for some sort of water craft.

The Florida seacoast is of stupendous length, considering the amazing reaches of the keys that stretch from Daytona down around the peninsula to Tampa Bay. Shore front, one would think, nature had supplied in lavish quantity, but when Davis opened his sand-sucker created land at St. Augustine and Tampa Bay there was a mad rush of investors. It is reliably stated that $50,000,000 of lots were sold on Davis Island, at Tampa, and at Davis Shores, at St. Augustine, following an advertising campaign of 100 days carried on exclusively in Florida dailies, with heavy over-subscription on the sales days.

Coral Gables, Hollywood, Boca Raton, Floranda Club and scores of such mammoth developments, scattered over the state, have been extensive advertisers, and their success has been monumental. In instances property values in towns that three years ago were obscure have run up to as high as $2,000 a front foot for building lots. This amount, of course, is not the record for the most desirable properties of the choicest cities. There many records of city lots selling at $5,000 per front foot.

Florida's promoters have often very unkindly, and in obviously bad judgment, borrowed names of California's famous towns and resorts and the great Pacific state's widely reported ire seems wholly justified. Perhaps it is true as the loyal Floridian points out, that in her turn California borrowed some of those romantic Spanish names from Mexico and that Mexico had previously swiped them from the original Castilian motherland, but to this humble critic the sight of well-known and much-beloved California names on new signboards jars the sense of justice. Why not hire the clever girl who named all the Pullman cars?

Florida is not an industrial center. The largest sponge market in the world is at Tarpon Springs. A section of the state is heavily loaded with phosphate,

FLORIDA TURNING TO DAILIES FOR RESULTS

Three Million Dollars Spent in Direct Publicity to Attract the Outside World—Levy County and City Taxes to Raise Advertising Funds—How Towns Paved the Way for the Land Rush

By FRANK PARKER STOCKBRIDGE

Co-author of "Florida in the Making," which has become the official text book of the State building campaign. Mr. Stockbridge is now a resident of Jacksonville.

"THE swing of Florida's advertising outside of the state is more and more strongly away from the magazines and toward the daily newspapers," said Dudley V. Haddock, director of publicity for the Florida State Chamber of Commerce, when I asked him to outline the efforts of that organization to "put Florida on the map." Mr. Haddock is a native Floridian with a wide newspaper experience covering, among other things, eleven years on the Associated Press staff in Washington, Atlanta, New Orleans, and elsewhere.

FRANK P. STOCKBRIDGE

"We have had splendid results from our advertising last fall in the Saturday Evening Post and the Literary Digest," Mr. Haddock went on, "but the copy which we have been running in a list of 51 dailies, all the way from Hawaii to Portland, Me., and as far south as Birmingham, Ala., seems to be bringing an even larger proportion of enquiries. These range all the way from a request by a small boy in New Jersey for a live 'allergater' for his backyard menagerie to an appeal from a woman in Boston to locate her missing husband who disappeared several years ago after making the first payment on a lot in Florida. While the advertising program of our organization is somewhat opportunist, depending upon the funds in hand at any given time and the decision of the publicity committee of our Board of Directors, I think you can safely say that the future expenditures of the State Chamber of Commerce will be proportionately larger in the daily press than in the past."

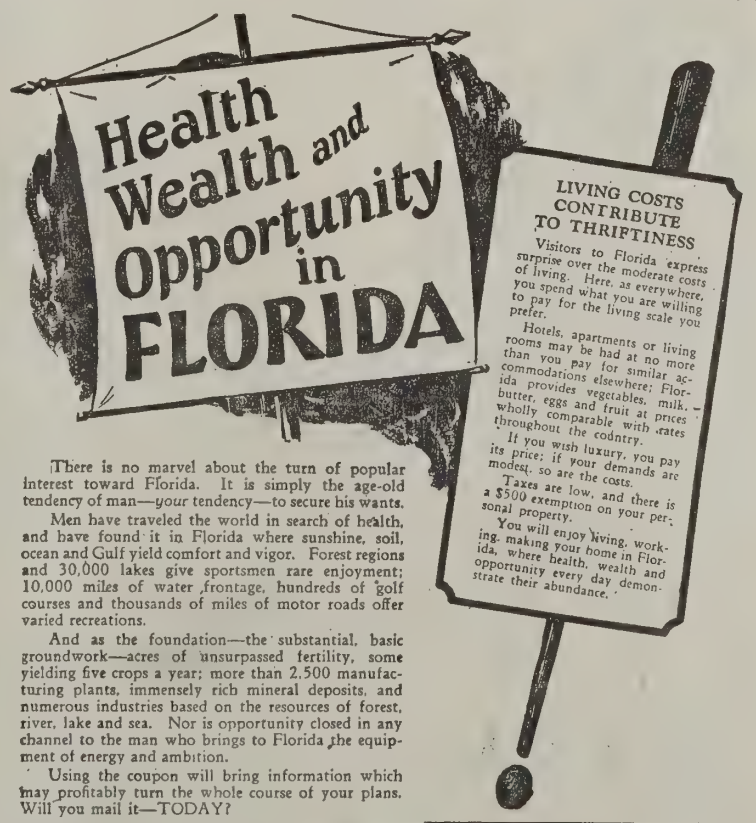
About $75,000 has been spent by the Florida State Chamber of Commerce since it began its national advertising campaign last December. This included three full pages in the Saturday Evening Post and Literary Digest and three quarter pages in the list of dailies already referred to. This $75,000, however, represents less than ten per cent of the "institutional" advertising done in the year ending February 15th by Florida counties, municipalities and districts in mediums outside of the state. The total for this class of advertising runs easily up to at least $750,000. If to that is added the extra-state advertising of Florida's real estate developers, the total volume of which can only be roughly estimated but which appears to be at least double the volume of community advertising, the impressive total of $3,000,000 for a year's campaign of selling Florida to the world appears like a conservative figure.

There are numerous local and county Chambers of Commerce in Florida which spend more money annually to advertise their communities than the State Chamber of Commerce is able to do. This is because the state organization's funds for this purpose are obtained only through voluntary contributions, while counties and municipalities are permitted under the Florida statutes to levy direct taxes for advertising and publicity purposes. This "millage" tax, as it is called, varies according to circumstances from half a mill to as high as ten mills in the dollar of assessed valuation. A Florida municipality or county waking up to a sense of its own importance in the scheme of things and imbued with a burning desire to tell the world of its virtues and attractions does not have to resort to a tag day drive or passing the hat, but merely goes to the legislature and gets a bill passed (which is done as a matter of course on sufficient representation of the local desire for it) authorizing the assessment of publicity tax. The disbursement of the funds raised by this method is intrusted in practically every instance to the community Chamber of Commerce, which thus exercises much more of a quasi public function than pertains to Chambers of Commerce elsewhere. Having obtained the necessary authority the Chamber of Commerce hires the best publicity man it can get hold of and turns him loose.

One result of this is a steady depletion of the staffs of Florida newspapers and a continuing influx of newspaper men from elsewhere into Florida. The newspaper man from any part of the United States touring Florida finds men who talk his own language in every Chamber of Commerce, to say nothing of the publicity departments of the big developments. Willis Powell, secretary of the Sarasota Chamber of Commerce is perhaps the dean of them all in length of service in Florida, having come to this state a dozen years ago after a long and active newspaper career in New York and Chicago, as editor of St. Petersburg Independent. M. G. Scheitlin, formerly managing editor of the New York Sun, is secretary-manager of the Leesburg Chamber of Commerce. Dr. W. E. Aughinbaugh, for several years on the staff of the New York Commercial, is the Chamber of Commerce secretary at Clermont. George C. Clemens, a veteran of the old Laffan Bureau, is doing his best to put the town of Bartow on the map.

Concrete reports covering the entire volume of Florida's community advertising have never been compiled. Specific examples from the principal centers, however, dealing only with extra territorial publicity, give a fair idea of what the total might be. The greater Palm Beach Chamber of Commerce, for example, reports the expenditure of approximately $40,000, about equally divided between magazines and newspapers. "We used 48,012 lines in 45 newspapers in Detroit, Kansas City, St. Louis, Omaha, Buffalo, Brooklyn, New York City, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago Indianapolis, Des Moines, Louisville, Baltimore, Boston, Pittsburgh, Milwaukee, Atlanta, Birmingham and Nashville," reports Gerry Swinehart, director of publicity, "in addition to which we used space in 37 different magazines of national circulation."

St. Petersburg, often referred to as "The City that Advertising Built," until this year led all of Florida's municipalities in the extent of its advertising program. In the past year St. Petersburg spent about $75,000 in advertising, using practically all the important papers in every city above 250,000 population besides using all the principal national magazines.



Jacksonville within the last few months has taken the leadership away from St. Petersburg. Jacksonville's advertising is handled through two separate channels. Almost alone among Florida Chambers of Commerce, that organization in Jacksonville has nothing directly to do with publicity for the city. It is an old established institution on familiar Chamber of Commerce lines, concerning itself largely with such matters as railroad rates, cotton and grain shipments, and grades, and other matters of importance to the business world. The City Commission (practically every city in Florida has the commission form of government) makes an annual appropriation of $75,000 for publicity promotion, which included $30,000 for bill boards in various parts of the country, $20,000 for music in the parks, $10,000 for booklets and about $15,000 for newspaper advertising, chiefly in special editions. But about a year ago a group of live young Jacksonville business men headed by James Stockton, decided that if the Chamber of Commerce was not going to exercise its normal Florida function of "boosting" Jacksonville, they would do it themselves. Accordingly they organized the Believers in Jacksonville, engaged Al Harris, an able young newspaper man with Atlanta and Jacksonville experience as executive secretary, and passed the hat. They speedily enrolled 1,000 members each contributing $10 a month, the fund to be used exclusively for advertising Jacksonville to the rest of the world. They wisely began their campaign by using full page copy in the Jacksonville dailies to advertise their city to its own citizens. Jacksonville, which had been lagging behind the rest of the state, developed a new civic spirit as a result of this campaign and, incidentally, young Mr. Stockton who instigated the movement has just been awarded a gold medal voted by the local American Legion to "the most useful citizen of Jacksonville."

"We are carrying on a continuous program of advertising Jacksonville, using chiefly the Saturday Evening Post, the Chicago Tribune, and the New York Times," said Al Harris. "Our expenditure in these mediums for the first year will run to approximately $100,000."

Tampa is another city which has in the past trailed a long way behind many smaller Florida municipalities in its advertising expenditures. Tampa, like Jacksonville, has awakened to the fact that it has something to sell to the rest of the world besides the commodities of its enormous commerce. The Tampa Board of Trade during November, December and January just past spent $14,768 for national advertising, of which $9,140 went into magazines and $5,628 was used for newspaper space, covering the purchase of 14,500 lines in 34 newspapers in Chicago, New York, Boston, Indianapolis, Detroit, St. Louis, Kansas City, Minneapolis, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Columbus, Toledo, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Washington, Montreal, Toronto and Baltimore. Magazines used included the Literary Digest, Review of Reviews, Red Book, Cosmopolitan and Life. Tampa is immensely pleased with the result so far of its first national advertising venture, the increase in tourist traffic, this season over last being decidedly marked.

Fort Myers, whose slogan is "The City of Palms," spent through its Chamber of Commerce about $10,000 in the last year in display advertising, chiefly in daily newspapers, under the direction of Don Wilkie, a former Chicago newspaper man and son of an even more famous Chicago newspaper man, John W. Wilkie, late chief of the U. S. Secret Service. "We used chiefly the New York Herald Tribune and Sun, the Boston Post, Brooklyn Eagle, Philadelphia Inquirer, Atlanta Journal, Birmingham Age-Herald and Christian Science Monitor," reports Secretary Wilkie. "We plan to spend $20,000 in these and similar mediums this year in addition to advertising appropriations by the city direct, the local real estate board and others."

The little city of DeLand through its commercial club holds the record so far for straight newspaper advertising. DeLand shot its whole roll of $40,000 this season in the daily papers. Three thousand dollars was spent in Florida dailies and the balance in the Philadel-

Daytona Beach spent $21,318 in daily papers outside the state.

Miami's total advertising and publicity budget, handled through its Chamber of Commerce, tops that of all other Florida cities in its grand total but falls short of Jacksonville's in the amount spent in out-of-the-state advertising. "Our total expenditures chargeable to advertising and publicity for this season are $188,500," said Fred L. Weede, director of publicity. "Of this amount $65,000 was used in 70 newspapers and 30 magazines. We advertised Miami in the newspapers of the chief eastern and Canadian cities, in fact in all the large cities north of the Mason and Dixon Lines as far west as Omaha."

Lakeland, one of the livest and loveliest of Florida's inland cities, shows a strong trend to dailies in the report of Ike Parrish, publicity director of the Lakeland Chamber of Commerce, an organization with a larger membership than that of any other city in the United States save one. "Our advertising outside of the state totalled $25,675," said Mr. Parrish, of which $17,500 was spent in newspapers and $8,175 in magazines. We have used this season five quarter pages in the Saturday Evening Post, four one-third pages in the Literary Digest, a quarter page in Motor Life, two one-third pages in Sunland, and the rest of our advertising in national newspapers. We ran three 100 line ads and ten 56 line ads in Sunday papers and one 56 line ad in twelve special Florida editions in Boston, Atlanta, New York, Buffalo, Hartford, New Haven, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Des Moines, Omaha, St. Louis, Kansas City, Louisville, Charleston, Richmond, Baltimore, Washington, Toronto, Montreal, and Ottawa.

Totalling the figures already quoted gives an aggregate of $438,443. To this must be added the expenditures of more than two hundred chambers of commerce in Florida cities not enumerated above, and the special efforts of the group of counties lying west of the Suwannee River, collectively known as West Florida, which under the leadership of the Pensacola Chamber of Commerce last Fall undertook to raise a fund of $100,000 for the purpose of advertising that section of the state to the outside world. The effort was only partly successful, spending about $25,000.

There is no manner of doubt that more than half a million dollars, with probably 60 per cent of it or more used in the daily press, has been spent in the past few months in the direct advertising of Florida and Florida communities to the outer world.

That another season will see this amount greatly increased is also not to be doubted. The results this season have been encouraging in the extreme. Florida's growth in actual wealth, in bank deposits, in population and in land values in the past year has been almost unbelievable and there is no sign of any let-up in these essential lines of growth. The only thing that has slackened in Florida is a certain type of highly speculative real estate activity, practically pure gambling, and for this the substantial and far-sighted citizens of Florida are profoundly thankful. All of this advertising of Florida the commonwealth, and Florida communities is for the purpose of bringing, not gamblers but substantial citizens and permanent settlers into the state, and it is very definitely having that effect. And with the increase of population and taxable wealth that little millage tax for publicity purposes is automatically augmented and more and more of it will flow into the newspapers of the nation at large.

REAL ESTATE CROOKS MEETING SOLID OPPOSITION FROM FLORIDA BUSINESS

Written Especially for Editor & Publisher

By CARL HUNT

Executive Vice-President, Orlando Chamber of Commerce. Formerly Manager, Associated Advertising Clubs of the World.

WHENEVER an industry or a section prospers in America, we have what appears to be an inexhaustible supply of slick gentry who proceed, by hook or crook, to cash in on public interest in the financial success of that industry or section.

For example, a few years ago, following the investigations of the operations of large insurance companies in New York, there was a veritable flood of small insurance companies formed all over the United States.

Almost all of them disappeared.

Then the automobile and tire business became the marvel of the financial age—and scores of fraudulent companies were organized in that field.

Thence the crook turned to oil.

And so, it is not surprising that the astonishing rush of men and money to Florida—a rush similar in many ways to the rush to the Klondike, or the California gold rush of '49—should have been the cue for many a crook to turn his attention to Florida.

And I have been asked to discuss, briefly, what Florida is doing about it.

Florida is doing all she can.

I came to Florida recently enough to have an outside point of view and have been here long enough to be able to feel the pulse of Florida and to know what is in the minds and the hearts of the men who are engaged in the task of building the state.

My work in the past has taken me to every nook and corner of the United States. There are, indeed, few cities of 25,000 and larger that I have not visited—and visited, too, in connection with the Advertising Club movement, and for the purpose, among other things, of measuring interest, in that community, in the betterment of business ethics.

That statement I have made to qualify as a witness when I say that in all my experience I have not met men in business more anxious to play square, more jealous of the good name of their home town or state, more open-minded upon the subject of ways and means not only for acquiring and retaining a good reputation, but for deserving such a reputation.

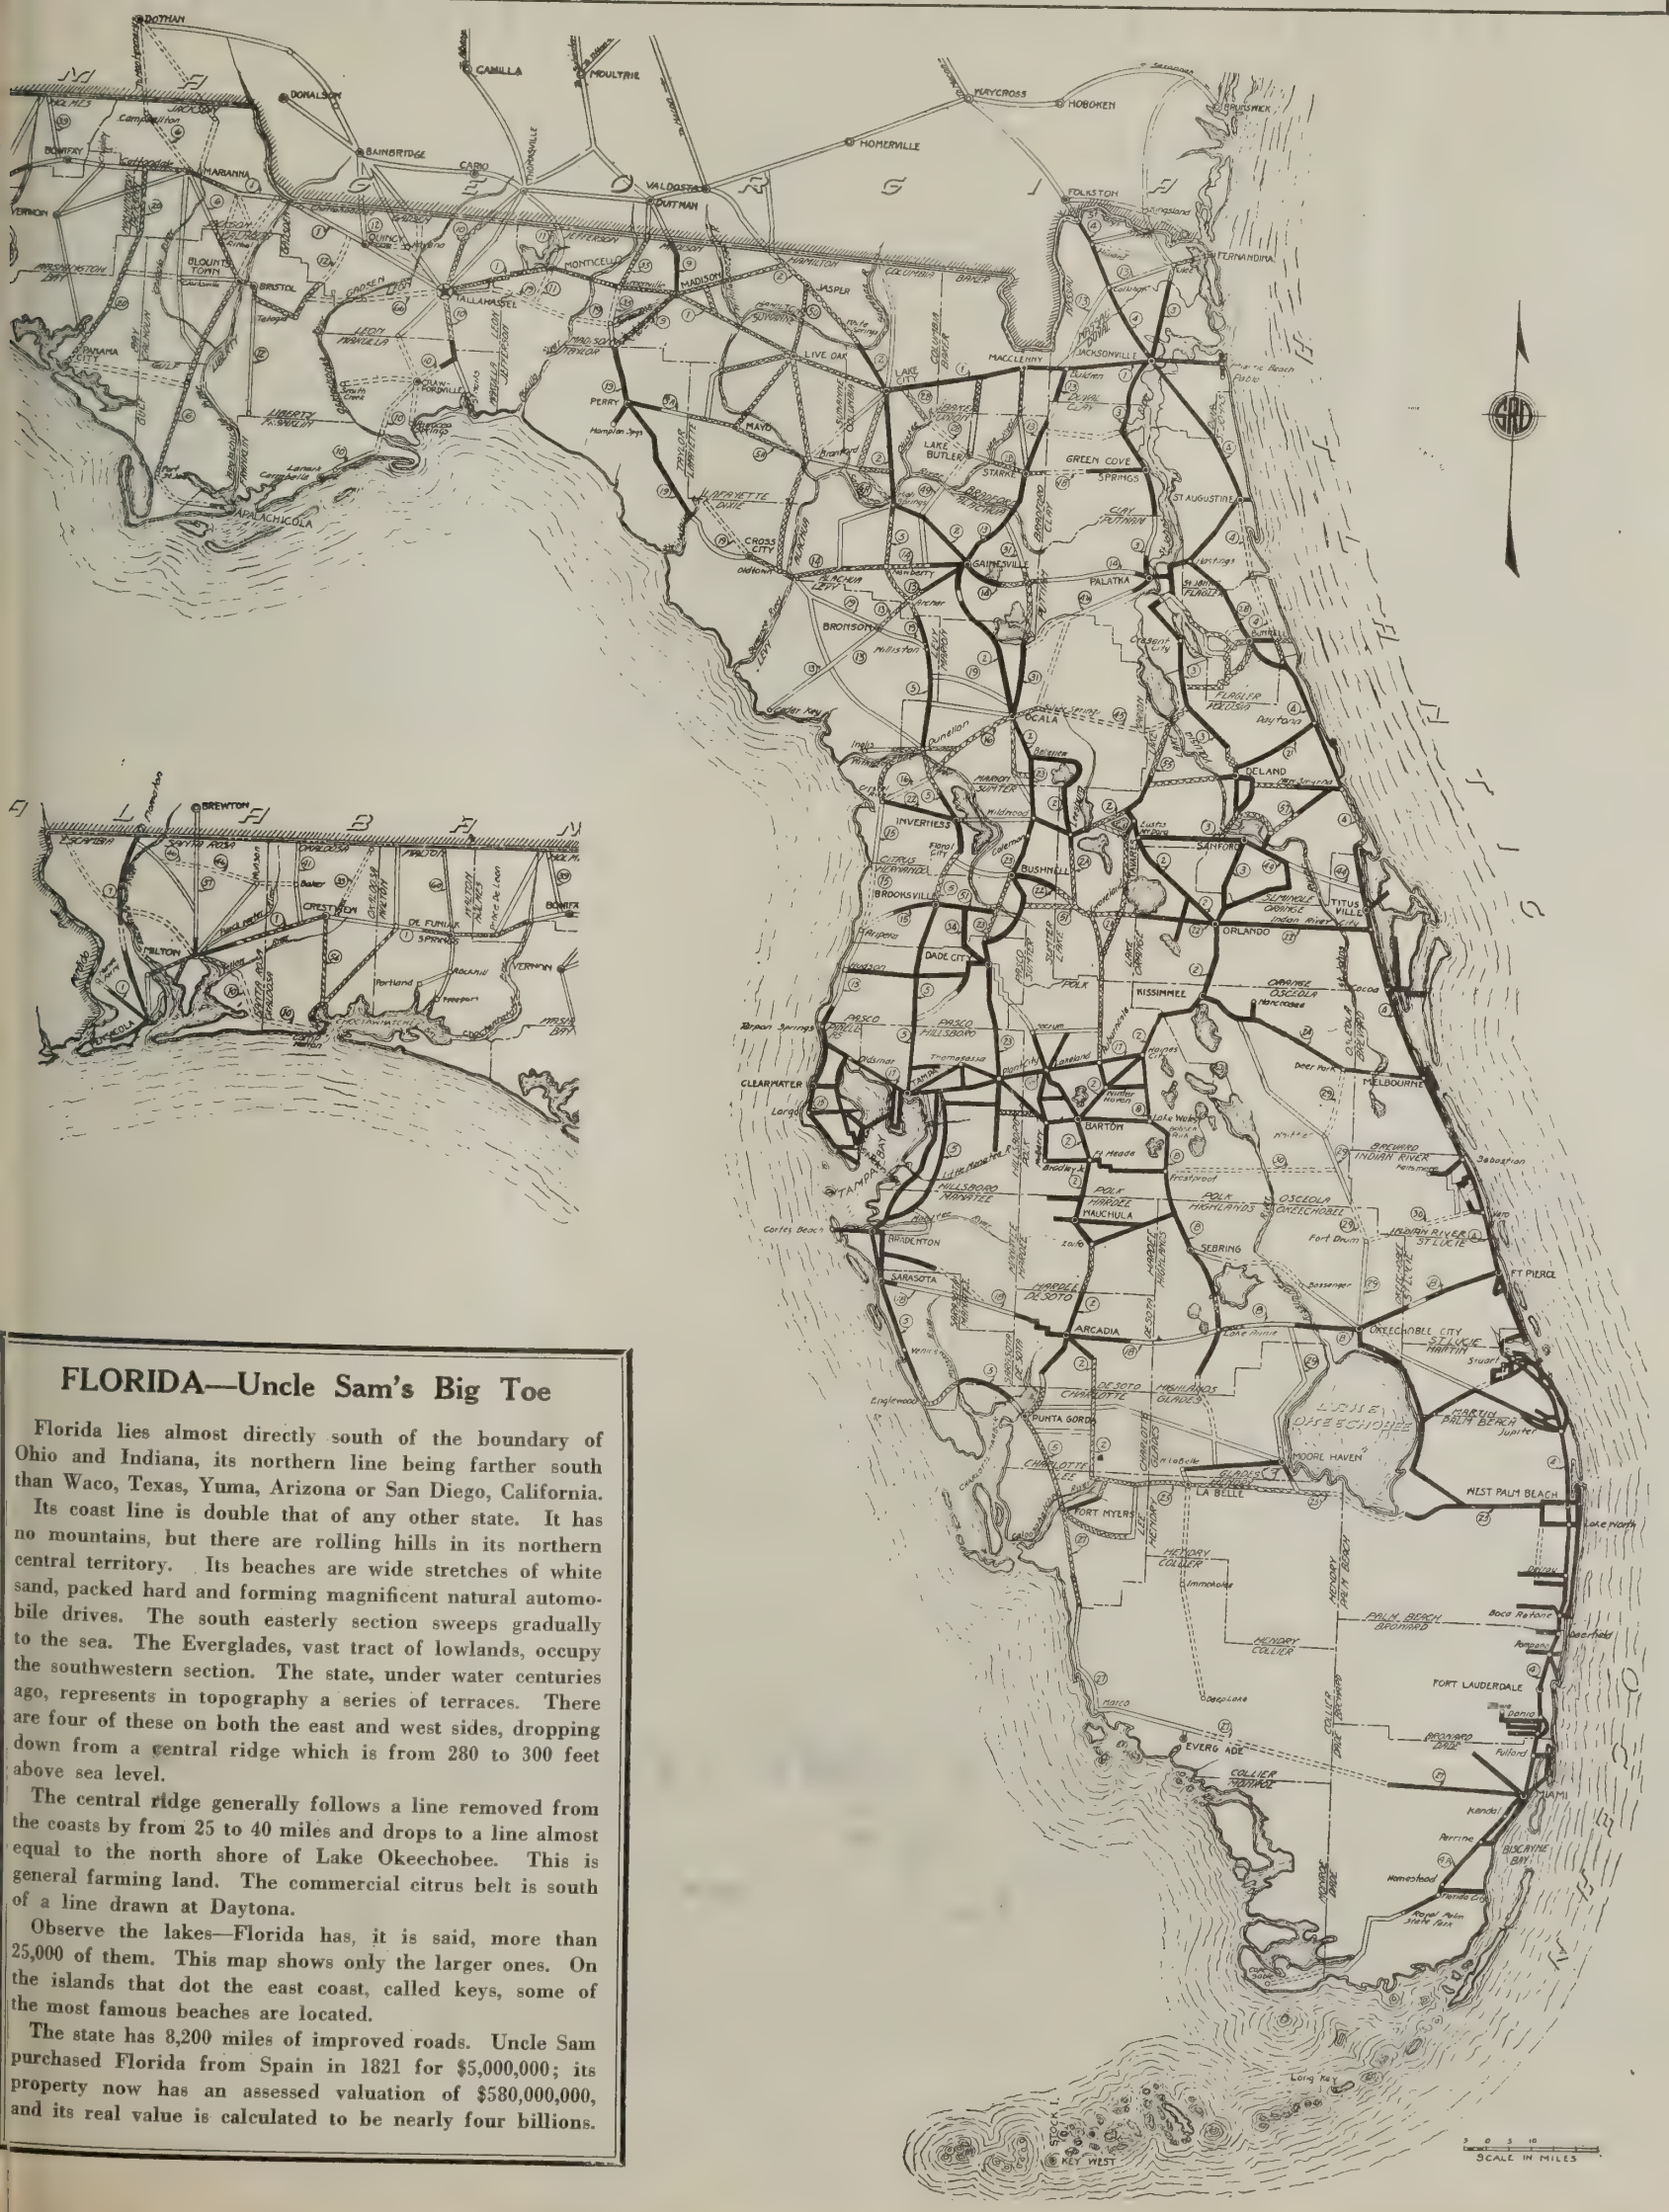
No state in the union has advertised as Florida has—nowhere has community advertising been so thoroughly sold. Through public taxation as well as the raising of large funds through Chamber of Commerce membership drives, big advertising appropriations have been raised.

Florida today is somewhat in the position of the manufacturer of a new product who, for some reason, did not get full returns from his advertising, then suddenly found himself hardly able to fill his orders. Florida is working night and day shifts.

There are people outside Florida who have never set foot in the state, for the most part, who will tell you that all the people of Florida are crazy. People who come to Florida are crazy. Everything that has a Florida tan or a grain of sand sticking to it is crazy.

But wait. No business was ever built upon any other foundation than satisfied customers. No advertising ever paid except where the goods were worthy. I am reminded of a verse I read the other day:

A lion met a tiger as they drank beside the pool,
Said the tiger to the lion, "You are roaring like a fool."
"That's not foolish," said the lion, with a twinkle in his eyes,
"They call me king of all the beasts because I advertise."



A rabbit heard them talking, and ran home like a streak.
He thought he'd try the lion's plan, but his roar was just a squeak.
A fox came to investigate—had luncheon in the woods—
So when you advertise, my friends, be sure you've got the goods.

NEW CITIES AND FINE ROADS SHOWN ON RECENT MAP

FLORIDA—Uncle Sam's Big Toe

Florida lies almost directly south of the boundary of Ohio and Indiana, its northern line being farther south than Waco, Texas, Yuma, Arizona or San Diego, California.

Its coast line is double that of any other state. It has no mountains, but there are rolling hills in its northern central territory. Its beaches are wide stretches of white sand, packed hard and forming magnificent natural automobile drives. The south easterly section sweeps gradually to the sea. The Everglades, vast tract of lowlands, occupy the southwestern section. The state, under water centuries ago, represents in topography a series of terraces. There are four of these on both the east and west sides, dropping down from a central ridge which is from 280 to 300 feet above sea level.

The central ridge generally follows a line removed from the coasts by from 25 to 40 miles and drops to a line almost equal to the north shore of Lake Okeechobee. This is general farming land. The commercial citrus belt is south of a line drawn at Daytona.

Observe the lakes—Florida has, it is said, more than 25,000 of them. This map shows only the larger ones. On the islands that dot the east coast, called keys, some of the most famous beaches are located.

The state has 8,200 miles of improved roads. Uncle Sam purchased Florida from Spain in 1821 for $5,000,000; its property now has an assessed valuation of $580,000,000, and its real value is calculated to be nearly four billions.

MAKING FAME FOR FLORIDA

By MARLEN PEW

PARALLELING the astonishing story of the Florida land rush of 1923-6 is the equally thrilling narrative of the sudden rise to power and affluence of the 94 daily and Sunday newspapers of the state, 23 having sprung into being during the past year.

The history of world journalism holds no comparable chapter of romantic pioneer development, either in point of instant success of individual editors and publishers or of the triumph of the press medium as an instrument for the promotion of civic and business enterprises.

The colossal Florida land sale, the spectacular building boom, the Winter vacation enterprise which lured some 2,000,000 visitors to the state during 1925, and myriad concomitant business developments that followed in the wake of these sensational activities, have depended in large measure upon newspaper advertising for success. Almost every enterprise has rushed its claims into paid space in the local press and the result has been a titanic wave of display advertising, swelling the newspapers to unheard-of proportions.

Native and new-comer seemed equally keen to trade through newspaper columns. The publishing office became at once the clearing house for every man's ambitions.

The display page became the unit of measurement of the leading advertisers. Never anywhere has there been such a wild scramble and crush among advertisers for notice. One of the commonest features of Florida newspaper advertising is an entire column in a classified department taken to display a card announcement, or some six to ten-line classified item, set in 8-point body type.

For the newspapers the problem has not been to solicit business, but rather to get into type and on newsprint the avalanche of copy that swept up to the counter every day, often accompanied by cash in advance.

This has been the situation in Florida for two years, increasing in volume and intensity until a few weeks ago it seemed that the sky was the limit. It is the situation in Florida today, slightly modified by reason of the fact that the high fever point of land speculation appears to have been touched, being supplanted by cooler and safer investment practises, for which many publishers told this writer they were devoutly thankful.

Co-incident with the whirlwind real estate advertising campaign there has been an abrupt awakening of commercial institutions to take advantage of the golden flood sweeping down from the north. Money was easy on all sides. Advertising would sell almost any useful thing. Truth is that the newspapers in many instances neglected to press for commercial business, so great was the demand for space by the real estate traders.

However, first class national and local store and service copy was offered and now, as highly speculative land advertising appears to be tapering off, commercial business is rising in excellent volume to take its place. Many publishers are encouraging this. Some charge extra rates for real estate display matter, holding that real estate should pay the highest rate on account of its transient nature.

Others frankly state they do not want their newspapers to continue to be as heavy and unwieldy in the hands of the boy carrier and the reader as during the past year.

However, high rate or low, the real estate tide continues to flow and Florida's important city papers are of greater size than the newspapers of the big centers of population in the north and west, and the average small town daily compares in size with the newspapers of first class cities anywhere. Practically every newspaper is publishing to plant capacity and all over the state new newspaper buildings have risen or are in course of construction and the vendors of mechanical equipment and newspaper service have had a selling field day in the state.

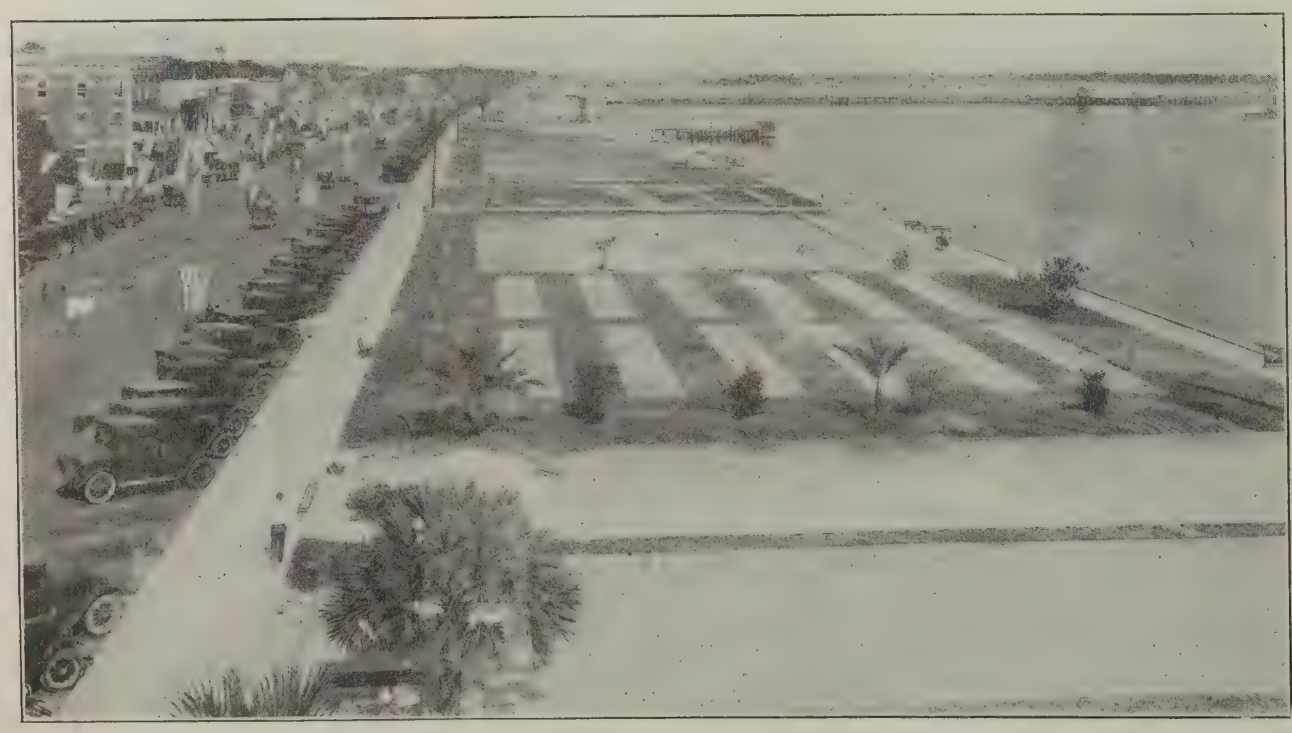
Florida newspaper men have won glittering fortunes as if over night. The little struggling paper of a few years or even months ago, under the magic spell of the Florida boom has become a whizzing daily, netting $10,000 to $50,000 or more per month for its proprietor, with every man jack of the staff a beneficiary, as wages in Florida are high, with native living costs now well controlled and not at all exorbitant. Wages of working newspaper men are perhaps 25 per cent above comparable situations in the north or west. The bonus system obtains in many mechanical departments. Some have dabbled in real-estate and won fortunes there to add to the riches that have poured into the coffers of their newspaper counting rooms. There have been instances where newspaper publishers have traded advertising space for land, and, whether or not this fact may be viewed with alarm by the newspaper profession in general, this writer knows of instances where such trades have netted the publisher a thousand per cent increase over card rates. Did other advertisers complain and demand equal treatment? They did not. Were there effective boycotts of the press by combinations of realtors because some land operators were paying for their advertising with land, or part land and part cash, whereas others were buying their space with all cash? Not at all.

Such a thing would be wholly discordant, entirely foreign to the spirit of the Floridian hippodrome state building campaign.

"Are you getting yours, Tom?" "Surest thing you know, Harry!" "Hurrah, good for you, old top!" That is the Florida spirit. They are actually happy at each other's success, whereas in colder climates jealous men have been known to hamstring brothers as a penalty for achievement.

Black envy does not seem to be in the Florida picture at all, and perhaps that is one reason why the shining sun does not scorch the skin even in mid-summer and why every flower carries in addition to ravishing size and color fragrance that fills the air and charms the senses.

This writer found in Florida a co-operative organization of daily newspapers, directed by a talented and thoroughly experienced newspaper man, through which the problems of all are cleared. One publisher has run out of paper. A fellow publisher lends him his need. Another craves an able composing room foreman and the best printer of an adjoining city is taken from his job and sent temporarily or permanently to fill the more important vacancy.



Shyster newspaper tricks have no place in Florida. The advertising swindler is soon caught and ousted. Better Business Bureau practices are rapidly being installed. Pikers are automatically eliminated from the pale.

The swift turn of the wheel of fortune did not throw Florida's newspaper profession out of ethical gear. The temptation to make mere billboards of newspapers and profit without proportionate service to readers has, in general, been turned aside. On the contrary, publishers have turned their good fortune to excellent public uses. With lavish hand they have supplied their readers with the best news and entertainment that the markets of the world afford. The click of the telegraph key or the automatic printer is heard in the smallest town offices.

The usual disposition of the Florida editor is to encourage, indeed to fight

The sand-sucking dredge in the brand new industry of making new land, pumping sand from the bottom of a bay for an island or shore that overnight becomes one of Florida's most eagerly sought homesites. Both coasts have gained from this form of enterprise.

The joy of living is in the hearts of the Floridian. The strips of cement are outdoor shuffle boards, crowded with recreation-seekers, men and women, young and old every bright afternoon. This scene depicts Halifax Park, the shore line of Daytona.

STATE'S PRESS WON FORTUNE

for every form of local community or state improvement. Perhaps the best thing that he has done has been to cultivate and foster in the public mind the spirit of co-operative effort and liberal spending for noble causes. It may be a public school, a community chest, a paved highway through the tangled forests of pine and palms, the deepening of a harbor, the building of a church or woman's club, the opening of a new bank or store, the extension of a railroad or the entertainment of a few hundred delegates to a convention—whatever it may be, if it spells O-u-r F-l-o-r-i-d-a, there is no string to the purse of the community in general or the individual in person. Hospitality is met on every street. People are happy and want you to participate. Rich man, poor man, beggar man (well, hardly the latter) finds welcome if, and only if, he comes to add to the joy of living under the Florida sun.

Fighting editors have appeared to battle against wrongs that proverbially, like buzzards on the trail of the pioneering caravan, follow booms. The editorial policies of the newspapers have not, in general, been supine. Most of the fraudulent advertising that is being discussed in relation to the Florida activity has been done outside of the state. Long before the Better Business Bureau idea entered Florida in force local editors were censoring doubtful advertising. Florida newspapers compare favorably for editorial spunk and enterprise with those of any state in the union, despite the unusual economic condition. They have been badly harassed by press agents and managements have permitted irresponsible land propagandists to say a mouthful of overbaked superlatives in news columns, but considering the amazing advertising crush, perhaps even this situation is not much worse than it is in Chicago, Boston, New York, Philadelphia or other large cities where press agents habitually walk all over editors with passports from the business office.

In addition to lively public service in their news and editorial columns, Florida publishers have entered into the spirit of the new day by building ornamental plants on main streets or by equipping satisfactory old offices with the finest plants that money can purchase.

This correspondent has just concluded an automobile tour of Florida, during which scores of newspaper offices were visited and perhaps two hundred newspaper men interviewed. This inspection gives rise to the following general observation:

Florida journalism challenges the world for federated spirit, professional pride, cause devotion, down-on-the-knuckles hard work, and rewards. Men from the North, West and adjoining Southern states are here setting a fast pace. They are winning and they bubble with pride and joy.

Prosperity is contagious in Florida and its most noticeable effects are smiling countenances and happy words.

Your Floridian jumped into the game first and some of the soundest successes are those of native born newspaper makers. No one cares a whoop whether his rival hails from rock-ribbed Maine, Chin-chin-natty, Yuma or points north, east, south or west. If he's a good fellow and parts his hair on the side, he may sit in and draw a hand. The big adventure has called out the talent of young and old, men and women, sturdy kids and pretty girls, all dressed up like editors, publishers, managers, reporters, able printers and circulators, going some place in particular and obviously happy to be in the gay parade. These newspaper folk are a living repudiation of the popular northern notion that the human tendency is to recline and doze under a topic sky.

One of the curiosities that the visitor finds all over Florida is a county or city taxation system, varying according to local requirements or local progressive spirit, for advertising purposes. For instance, in the county in which Tampa is located there is a tax upon realty of two mills for advertising. The funds are invariably administered by local boards of trade or chambers of commerce and are frequently augmented by subscription by individuals or institutions. This taxation system for publicity purposes explains much of Florida's boom success. It is by no means a recent innovation. In the case of Tampa the official advertising system has been in process for six years. Whereas, in the past, considerable money was spent for magazine and knick-knack advertising there is now a settled policy over most of the state to apply the major portion of the fund to newspaper advertising both within and outside of Florida.

All that has been happening to the Florida daily press during the past two years has been enacted on a minor scale among the weeklies. Dozens have expanded to the limits of their printing facilities or to meet the rush have doubled or tripled their weekly editions. Most of the new dailies were struggling weeklies a year or two ago, bursting forth in six- or seven-day form with the sudden development of their communities. This writer learned of a weekly which is published in a town that boasts no more than 250 people, although there are a few thousand widely scattered rural farmers in the trading area. Publishers that were content with one edition a week two, three or five years ago, now preside over institutions issuing dailies, with fat Sunday numbers with all the colors and "fixings" of the big city paper.

Lake Worth, one of the sensationally developed towns on the East coast of Florida, near Palm Beach, presents a complete journalistic phenomenon in the fact that it possesses today three lively daily newspapers, Leader, Herald and News that did not exist one year ago. These newspapers have the appearance of well-established sheets, are filled with advertising, largely real-estate and classified, and each is reported to be profitable.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER readers are hereby invited to come down the line, from Jacksonville to Fort Myers, across the state to Miami and thence north on the shining East Coast and make the acquaintance of members of the fraternity that this writer was fortunate enough to meet on an all too brief tour of the state made during two weeks of February. They join in telling the most romantic success narrative that has ever been written in this class journal. They are typical of all the newspaper and advertising folk of the state. Some have done better than others. But every man's hat has been in the ring and each has copped some measure of achievement. Necessarily all the stories of individual success cannot be related in this issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, but incidents recounted in the following pages may be accepted as typical, in varying degrees of importance, of the whole.

Major Brown Compels Sun To Shine in St. Petersburg

A MAN that every journalist in America should be acquainted with is Major Lew B. Brown, one of Marse Henry Watterson's boys, now grown grey in newspaper service. Major Brown is worth knowing intimately because of his gentle spirit, his skilful technique in publishing and his genius as an editor. By many he is regarded as the dean of the newspaper fraternity of Florida.

Seventeen years ago he came to St. Petersburg from Louisville in quest of health for his wife, a victim of rheumatism. The present city was then a fishing village of some 3,500 people, droning easily along without much interest in the affairs of life beyond the limitations of the immediate district and the simple humdrum of the hour and day.

When the man from Kentucky bought the local evening newspaper, the St. Petersburg Independent, from W. B. Powell for $12,000, which included an equity in the office real-estate, he was actually cartooned in the state as a "northern sucker." Major Brown went to work to build a real newspaper on ground in which his faith was unbounded. He believed that this town would become a city, basing his calculation upon such stable factors as an excellent natural port, a fertile countryside, natural beauty and healthful climate. The first years were difficult. One day the editor worked until he fainted in his tracks. He sold advertising at 5 cents per inch, and few believed that the Independent could measurably serve business.

Fine architecture, clean streets, make the trading center of St. Augustine notably beautiful. The main streets and drives are spacious, but in the heart of the ancient city the visitor is attracted by the squirming narrow streets and their romantic balconied houses.

It has made Major Brown a rich man. He told this writer that he has now lost interest in making money, and is most concerned by the welfare of the community and the state. His advertising sells today at 5½ cents per line and he said that the circulation of his paper was just under 14,000. The paper averages 48 pages per day, 60 per cent of which is advertising.

"On occasion as high as 90 pages are run in a regular edition, specials being against the policy of the Independent.

"We have had no circulation solicitors, no premiums, no stunts," said Major Brown. "Whatever the success of this newspaper it is natural and real."

In 1909 Major Brown wrote and printed in his newspaper a poem which carried the title "Sunshine City." It has become the slogan of St. Petersburg and the visitor sees it on every hand. Perhaps it was because of his gratitude to the sun for his wife's complete recovery that he dwelt much upon the beneficience of Old Sol's daily visitation to St. Petersburg. On September 1, 1909 the editor of the Independent announced that the newspaper would be given free on the streets and to subscribers any day that the sun did not shine before press time in St. Petersburg. This stroke of enterprise created a local sensation. Many timid merchants advised Major Brown that he had made a mistake, that there were more cloudy days than he had calculated and that the stunt might ruin him. But for fifteen years Major Brown has kept standing in the left ear of the Independent this challenge to the elements and offer to the public:

The Sunshine Paper
Gives away its ENTIRE CIRCULATION, absolutely free, to EVERYBODY, evey day the sun does not shine on St. Petersburg.

The sun did not shine for two days in succession during the week before this writer arrived in St. Petersburg, which little oversight cost Major Brown just $4,500, but the record for the 15¼ years that the sunshine offer has been in force totals only 86, an average of 5½ times a year that the Independent has been given free to its entire circulation.

"It has been effective in describing the quality of St. Petersburg's climate to the outside world and that is what I sought," said the editor. "We pay the newsboys to cry the paper on the streets on free days and we penalize any boy found selling a copy. Newsdealers have entered into the spirit of the game and they give the paper away, receiving it free. Our carriers are paid by the week and subscribers are credited with one free copy each time the sun goes against us. To out-of-town subscribers we send souvenir receipts. There is no official watch upon the sun, but everyone in the office, particularly in the mechanical department, is mindful of the standing offer and is watching the weather. On any doubtful day hundreds of people are alertly watching.

"The sun must show sufficiently to throw a distinct shadow. Frequently we have announced free papers and have had indignant subscribers calling and writing to protest that the sun did shine in some part of the city."

When Major Brown bought the Independent it had a payroll of $126. It is now more than $6,000, with a staff augmented from 7 men to 162, exclusive of the circulation assistants. The deadline for advertising copy is 6 p. m. of the day previous to publication and all advertising is set at night.

Major Brown and his newsaper have been behind such great local movements as the widening to 100 feet of the beautiful main thoroughfare, parks built by sandsuckers replacing dismal marsh land, a magnificent system of parks, a charter clause which makes property pay the cost of improvements while the city advances the finances through bond sales, extensive paving and road building, a magnificent concrete ship harbor, grass lawns to replace the "white yard" of sand, and many other local improvements.

Miami's impressive skyline, towering skyscrapers making it look increasingly like the profile of little old Manhattan. From these towers one looks upon a solid city and magnificent waterfront.

"I recall the time when the best land out toward the Gandy Bridge, which is the longest in the world, could be bought for $40 an acre," said the editor. "One acre was sold there last week for $65,000.

"What does that mean? When I came here there were no roads out of the county; we travelled through the woods on the sand. Transportation has made it possible for people to easily find this beautiful place. It is a clean town, filled with a high type of people. There are too few churches to accommodate the crowds in the winter season and two and three services are held on Sunday mornings to accommodate the congregations. There is the right spirit here, team-work and civic pride and the joy of big achievement for the common good. Men, not bricks, make a city.

"The Independent has kept pace with the legitimate demands of the unusual activity of the past two years. To do so we have been constantly adding to the equipment and I have bought eleven important items of machinery since last May. I bought a linotype in New York and had it up and running here in eleven days. Our policy is to pay cash for all that we purchase.

"We are doing all possible to encourage commercial advertising. In the Winter the real estate business occupies 50 per cent of the space, but in summer it does not amount to more than 15 per cent. We discourage what we consider disproportionate spreads. A huge paper is too much of a burden upon the boys and is unwieldly in the hands of readers. I believe in more intensive advertising, well written and well displayed."

The Independent was sixth among 6-day papers in the 1925 linage race, having rolled up a total of 15,987,741.

The general manager of the Independent is Chauncey Brown, the Major's son, recognized throughout the state as able and possessing many of the Major's admirable qualities. In his private life Major Brown is known as one of the most accomplished Bible students in America.

Shutts "Wouldn't Sell Miami Herald for $5,000,000"

THE man who owns the Miami Herald, famed advertising linage leader of the world and deserving of fame for even better causes than that, started business life selling the Post on the streets of Cincinnati.

"Frank B. Shutts bought the old Miami News-Record in 1910 for $5,000, paid off its $5,000 of debts and changed its name to Miami Herald. Last week he said to this writer: "I would not sell it for $5,000,000."

Mr. Shutts came to Florida sixteen years ago from Aurora, Ind., where he was practising law. The story of his success is widely quoted in the state. He practices law as his first interest, his professional business being reported the largest in Florida. His second interest is the Herald and after that he is concerned with other and sundry real estate and banking interests.

Frank B. Stoneman, former editor of the News-Record, remained with Mr. Shutts as editor of the Herald and continues in that capacity today, an able newspaper men, much beloved in the community. Olin W. Kennedy, whose journalistic reputation is national, joined the Herald in 1920 and is its rapid-fire managing editor. George V. Harper is business manager, surrounded by an eager staff of business getters, builders of the towering Herald agate linage of 1925, totaling no less than 42,513,436 for the daily and Sunday, surpassing by many millions of lines all previous linage records.

The Herald is one of the most electrifying newspaper offices that this writer has witnessed in world-wide travel. Its mechanical plant is soon to be housed in a new four-story manufacturing building adjoining the business and editorial office building.

The equipment is new and cost between $300,000 and $400,000.

During 1914 the Herald daily averaged 55 pages, the Sunday issue 121.6 pages. There were no special editions. A total of 7,681½ tons of newsprint were consumed. The composing room battery i cludes 43 type-setting or type-makir machines, whereas the press room hol one 48-page Hoe, one 32-page Scott, o 32-page Hoe unit awaiting installatic 64-page new Scott, with an addition in April.

The Herald's payroll amounts $43,000 per week, divided among 6 employees.

Never has there been a more liber spender of dollars to make two gro where one stood (to twist the met than Publisher Shutts. For instanc there was the problem of housing er ployees. Men came from various citi to join the staff, but were unhappy b cause of high rentals during the wint vacation rush season. Mr. Shutts spe a million dollars buying five apartme houses and 27 individual homes in whi to house his employees, holding rer around $60 per month. There is Herald employees' colony; the houses a apartments are scattered over the cit the newspaper employs a manager f the properties whose business it is keep everyone satisfied.

Here are some random facts concer ing this great daily newspaper of t South:

It has doubled in size in two years. subscribes to three complete news servic and maintains its own state service. employs seven staff photographers, prir ing two pages of half tones daily. "back country" editor reports agricultur developments—never telling farme "how." The editorial page is the fir page of the second section, handsome dress, progressive in tone, never critic of other states but highly zealous in t local cause.

Lowest salary on the editorial staff, $ Desk men paid $75 to $90. Printe receive $68 for day work, $73 for a nig week.

The Herald editorial offices are hea quarters for visiting editors. Olin Ke nedy recalled that during one week 1 Associated Press members had visited t plant.

On one day the Herald published a ticles of interest contributed by Geor

Horace Lorimer, Cyrus H. K. Curtis and William Jennings Bryan written to "get it off the chest" while loafing in Miami. The Herald has accumulated a huge morgue of photographs of national and world celebrities.

As one travels the roads as far north as Daytona, 265 miles, he sees attached to gates, trees, posts and fences yellow painted tin cylinders with Miami Herald printed in script on their sides. The newspaper maintains an automobile delivery system to the residences along the roads and the towns of Daytona on the north as far South as Florida City, near the end of the mainland. The tin boxes are stuffed seven days a week. A fleet of 15 trucks are used and the northern delivery is made in three relays, ending at Palm Beach, Fort Pierce and Cocoa, the Fort Pierce relay turning west to Okeechobee City.

The city delivery is divided into 24 substations, each with a manager and delivery is by truck. Altogether the Herald operates 64 motor cars in its business.

The Sunday Herald weighs 2½ pounds per copy and carrier boys are limited to 100 to 125 papers per route. The Sunday sells for ten cents, the daily for five.

The annual gross revenue of the newspaper is estimated at between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000.

Florida Times-Union Hailed as State's "Mother-Sheet"

"OLD DEPENDABLE" in Florida is Jacksonville, which had 91,000 population in 1920, according to the federal accountant, and today estimates its people at more than 150,000. Solid as the city is its morning and Sunday newspaper, the Florida Times-Union, by many Florida newspaper men looked upon as the "mother sheet."

The Times-Union is owned by the Flagler interests and was in fact the property of the late railroad builder who had the first clear vision of Florida as one of the great states of the union, and backed his judgment with his millions. The Times-Union is a conservative paper, a model of typography, alive in every particular and is today bulging with advertising. The A. B. C. rating for the daily issue is 40,791 and that of the Sunday 45,705. W. A. Elliott, the general manager, skilled newspaper man and well-known in the South, told this writer that the circulation had developed by leaps and bounds in recent months with the huge development of the city in that period. P. B. Ball is editor. There is no better equipped newspaper plant in the South and Mr. Elliott told of many recent additions to meet requirements.

Perry a Pioneer in "Discovering" Florida

JACKSONVILLE turned out en masse one evening last week to inspect the magnificent new home of the Jacksonville Journal, and pay respect to its owner and publisher, John H. Perry, one of the pioneers of the Florida "discovery" movement and winner of a fortune estimated in the millions as a reward for foresight and enterprise.

The Jacksonville Journal, which Mr. Perry added to his newspaper string about three years ago, is an evening newspaper, but at the reception last week Mr. Perry announced that the newspaper would immediately start publication of a Sunday issue.

Mr. Perry informed this writer that the Journal was paying a handsome profit and its contents and the appointments of its fine home corroborated that statement eloquently. A special housewarming edition of the Journal was published for the reception, telling the history of the Journal, formerly the Florida Metropolis, founded in 1887.

The elite of Jacksonville danced to orchestra music on the polished floors of the new building on the opening night and hundreds inspected the glittering new mechanical plant. The building is 105 feet square, with three floors and basement, a total of 44,000 square feet of floor space. It is just four times larger than the building that the Journal recently vacated. The first floor is occupied by the business, advertising and circulation departments; second, editorial, photographic, art, classified and engraving departments, and the third floor by the composing and stereotyping departments. The press room is a novelty. It occupies the basement and a section of the first floor, is cut off from the main building to prevent vibration, opens on the front to the street so the public may see the huge press in motion, and is a model of light, airy and scrupulously neat mechanical installation. In the basement there is storage space for 40 carloads of newsprint. The paper is carried direct to the basement floor by trucks. Every item of the equipment is new and of the latest design.

The Journal is well serviced and is a lively local paper. It is edited by Sam Ellis, with Paul Webb as managing editor and B. V. Sturtivant, city editor. Frank P. Beddow, locally known as "Pop", one of the genius newspaper business men of the South, is general manager.

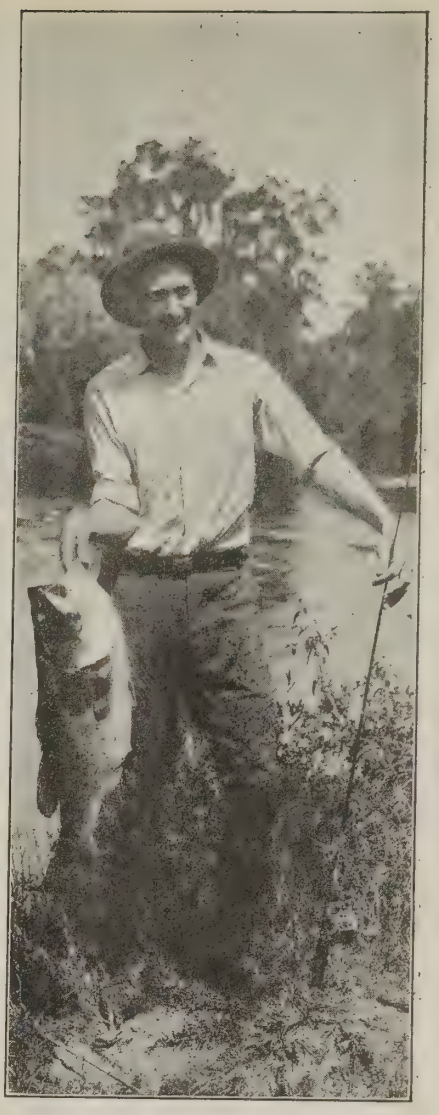
John H. Perry, nationally known as president of the American Press Association and of the Publishers' Autocaster Service, also owns in Florida the thriving Pensacola News and the equally successful Pensacola Journal, separate newspapers occupying the morning, evening and Sunday fields of the big and rapidly growing western section of the state, less discussed than the peninsula but rich in natural resources and by well-informed Floridians looked upon as the seat of huge future developments. Mr. Perry has eagerly engaged in land speculation, at times the owner of thousands of acres of shore or woodland property, with rapid fire trading in city real estate as well. He is also heavily engaged in Florida banking.

His winter home is at Palm Beach.

Tampa Scene of Lively Newspaper-Making

THIRTY-THREE years ago Col. W. F. Stovall founded the Tampa Tribune, accumulated a fortune through it, built a huge business building in the heart of Tampa which in part houses the newspaper, and in 1925 sold the Tribune, exclusive of the real estate, for $1,200,000, of which, according to an option agreement, $750,000 was paid in cash.

The sale of this big property is an odd chapter in newspaper history. The Tribune, under its new ownership, has scored increased growth and is one of the best established newspaper properties in the United States. In 1925 it printed 21,650,768 agate lines of advertising in its morning and Sunday morning issues, being 12th in the list of American newspapers in the 7-day field.



According to J. S. Mims, its business manager, the Tribune had 34,000 Sunday and 18,000 daily circulation in 1925, and in January, 1926, touched 60,000 for the Sunday and 33,000 for the daily, bettering these figures in the first two weeks of February.

The January linage count was 2,474,000 and the minimum general advertising rate for the daily is 9 cents and 11 cents is the rate for the Sunday.

The new proprietors of the Tribune are: Dr. L. A. Bize, president of the company, head of the Citizen's Bank and Trust Company, and interested in the motion picture industry, a local capitalist of importance; L. B. Skinner, vice-president, proprietor of the Hillsboro Hotel; M. W. Lloyd, secretary, a merchant and capitalist, and R. H. Tarr, treasurer, also heavily interested in Tampa commercial affairs.

The story of the sale has never been reported in detail. As related by Mr. Mims it is as follows: Col. Stovall for several years had occasionally threatened to sell the newspaper to various local interests, but when closing time came had, for sentimental reasons, declined to consummate the deal. Last Spring he was approached by a lady, the wife of a local business man, friend of the Stovall family, who secured from Col. Stovall a voluntary written offer to sell the Tribune, minus the Tribune building, which is one of the principal office structures of the city, for $1,200,000, of which $750,000 was to be paid in cash. It was a legal option to sell and the lady negotiated with Dr. Bize and his associates.

As in previous instances when the time came to consummate the deal, Col. Stovall's love for his paper asserted itself and he sought to retain it. However, the option was binding and Dr. Bize and his associates stood upon the contract. An offer by Col. Stovall, locally reported to have been $200,000, for the cancellation of the option was refused and Dr. Bize is declared to have said that he would not accept half a million dollars for the contract.

Bird's eye view of the business center of the new Tampa, where the structural iron-workers' rivetter sings all day and automobiles line the curbs out to the residential districts. Tampa has nearly tripled its population in three years.

At the appointed hour the option payment was made, but in their zeal to satisfy Col. Stovall, the purchasers laid down a check for $900,000, which Col. Stovall promptly refused to accept, holding that the contract called for exactly $750,000.

However, this did not nullify the trade as the purchasers promptly substituted a check for $750,000 and came into possession of the Tribune.

Immediately Col. Stovall and his son announced the formation of the Gulf Publishing Company for the publication of the Telegraph, in the Tribune's seven-day field.

Naturally considerable bitterness accrued and there are various versions in Tampa of what happened. At any rate, Mr. Mims, and E. D. Lambright, editor of the Tribune, both of whom had long been employed by Col. Stovall, declined to join many other employees in leaving the Tribune to join Wallace O. Stovall in the new rival venture. Most of the employees who did join Mr. Stovall went in as stockholders in the Gulf Company.

Since that time there has been a complete reorganization of the staff of the Tribune and EDITOR & PUBLISHER learned of some lively scenes in the office during the period of readjustment.

However, the Tribune, according to the office statistics, has moved steadily ahead and Wallace O. Stovall, speaking for the rival paper, declared that the Telegraph has made a profit every day that it has been published. Such is the elasticity of the huge Tampa field, which had but 51,000 population according to the Federal census of 1920, and 94,800 according to the state census of 1925, with winter estimates at the present time among the very best local guessers ranging to 150,000. Whether that figure be justified in fact or not, Tampa is a whizzing city and the newspapers are astonishingly prosperous.

The Tampa Tribune is a local institution, bearing the character imprint of Col. Stovall and his able staff. Col. Stovall is no longer young, although in health, and it is believed locally that his curious periodic disposition to sell his great newspaper, against the urgent advice of his close associates such as Mr. Mims, is accounted for by weariness due to overwork in the huge state-building campaign.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER was responsibly informed that the Tampa Tribune earned $400,000 net in 1925, just one-third of the total sale price.

THE Tampa Telegraph, with Wallace O. Stovall, son, of Col. W. F Stovall, as editor and S. Lloyd Frisbee as general manager, was started Oct. 11, 1925, as a morning and Sunday paper, Mr. Stovall, Mr. Frisbee and most of the staff having left the employ of the Tampa Tribune after it was sold by Col. Stovall to Tampa Tribune, Inc.

The new paper is housed in a large building in the center of the city, is well equipped, and according to Mr. Frisbee had "16,000 net paid subscribers before we got out the first issue." The circulation is now 25,000 per week day and 27,000 for Sunday, he said.

Many of the employees of the paper are stockholders in the Gulf Publishing Company, owners of the Telegraph. Mr. Frisbee said that the average number of pages for the week day paper was 32, with 84 to 108 on Sunday. He said that about 85 per cent of the advertising is of real-estate, with local rate at 6 cents for the daily and 7 cents Sunday.

The paper is lively, well-edited, prosperous in appearance, and a liberal buyer of service and equipment.

Mr. Stovall said: "We have made money from the first issue."

Solid Jacksonville, mother city of the new state, metropolitan in character, busy, beautiful, healthful, the camera's eye peeking from the great St. John's River Bridge. Notice the skyline of high buildings, of which many have risen during the past two years.

THE Tampa Globe was started in 1925, as a tabloid in the evening field, by John C. Martin, the editor and proprietor. It was an instant success. Its average size is 48 of the half-size pages and it is a lively newspaper, as well as conforming to American standards in tabloid pictorial and feature qualities. The paper goes in for local editorial discussions, printing its opinions in 24-point black-face body type on the back. The circulation department carries on a hot premium campaign, recently offering money, jewelry, automobiles and homesites as subscription prizes. The wave of real-estate advertising carried the tabloid to initial success, but it has now developed considerable commercial business, although still in its swaddling clothes. It sells for 5 cents.

THE circulation of Tampa Times, published as a six-day evening paper by D. B. McKay and under the general management of Charles G. Mullen, has tripled since 1919 and in 1925 this remarkable newspaper scored 14,652,904 lines of paid space. In January the paper printed 1,780,000 lines, only 40 per cent of which was real estate advertising, according to Mr. Mullen.

So great has been the success of this newspaper that work has been started on a new building to house its plant, to cost half a million dollars. In 1919 the paper had a payroll of $1,000 a week; today it is nearer $9,000. Its circulation has multiplied nine times in six years, Mr. Mullen stated.

D. B. McKay, the president of the company and editor of the paper, is a native of Tampa. His grandfather came to the little fishing village in his own ship from Scotland in 1846. Editor McKay came into the Times as a printer, rapidly succeeding to the positions of foreman, city editor, editorial writer and in 1897 proprietor. He gave the paper character and immense influence and the people of the city elected him their mayor for ten years.

Mr. Mullen is one of the famous Mullen family of newspaper publishers, four brothers and one sister all engaged in the industry.

Twenty-two men are employed in the advertising department of the Times, largely handling the paper's heavy volume of regular commercial business. Much of the real estate copy comes over the the counter. The average number of pages per issue is 50, compared to 14-16 six years ago.

The paper is brightly edited, clean and firmly entrenched in the homes of Tampa permanent residents. Mr. McKay has by no means lost the magic of his editorial pen and to the paper the city gives heavy credit for the amazing development of recent years.

Staffs Work Round the Clock To Make "St. Pete" Times

A NEW newspaper tower building is rising in Florida, soon to be the luxurious new home of the St. Petersburg Times, Paul Poynter's big seven-day morning paper, eighth in the list of linage leaders of the United States in 1925.

The new building will cost $1,500,000. By the first of June the first wing of the structure, 80 by 150 feet and eight stories high, will have been completed and the Times will make its abode there pending completion of the structure. There will be a complete new plant layout. Two new 48-page presses are now being installed in the new plant.

Paul Poynter, dynamic, public-spirited, ambitious, friendly, co-operative man, apparently 40 years of age, has won millions in Florida from a shoestring investment. He is the son of a Hoosier blacksmith, worked his way through college and jumped into the newspaper business with vim in Indiana. He is today the proprietor of these six newspapers: St. Petersburg Times, morning and Sunday; Sarasota Herald, morning and Sunday; Clearwater Sun, evening; Perry Herald, weekly; Kokomo (Ind.) Dispatch, morning and Sunday; Sullivan (Ind.) Times, evening.

It is said that Mr. Poynter paid $1,00 for controlling interest of the St. Peters burg Times 12 years ago. How gre must be the earnings of this paper toda is well indicated by the followi statistics:

Average number of pages printed du ing 1925, 64 for the daily, 164 f the Sunday. Only two years a the average of the daily was 16 pag with 32 for the Sunday, suggestive of t amazing growth. To meet the emergen the newspaper has worked day and nig shifts and the press has seen four or fi runs in a single day, to get off the dai and advance Sunday sections. Two ed torial staffs have operated by day an night.

One of the marvels of Florida journa ism is the mechanical feats of the st of the Times.

Mr. Poynter, it is reported locally, h cleaned up a large fortune in real-esta operations in addition to his big new paper success.

Associated with him is David B. Lin say, general manger of the Times. M Lindsay is the son of George D. Lindsa publisher of the Marion (Ind.) Chronic former president of the Inland Dai Press Association, and also editor a general manager of the new Poyn Florida paper, the Sarasota Herald. T son received his early training on t Marion Chronicle and then on the Fa etteville (N. C.) Observer, coming Florida to join Mr. Poynter in the t St. Petersburg success.

W. L. Straub is editor of the Time J. W. Falconnier, is managing edito Ed. W. Camp, business manager, and Armstrong, circulation manager.

According to the last A. B. C. sta ment, the Times was the local leader circulation both Sunday and daily. T paper is an excellent example of ra newspaper printing, is conservative tone, complete in news coverage and e tertaining.

It is one of the cleanest and sound properties in the South.

udacious Tabloid Journalism l St. Petersburg

RANK F. PULVER, prominent real estate and hotel man at St. Petersburg, on March 6, 1925, started publication of St. Petersburg Daily News, morning and Sunday tabloid, with Major lfred Birdsall as editor and general anager. Major Birdsall entered the al field after metropolitan newspaper perience and expert tabloid knowledge, e latter gained in the service of the anderbilt tabloids.

The News made rapid strides, averagig 48 to 88 of the half-size pages on eek days and up to 156 pages on Sunay. It is alive with illustrations, crisp ws items and features, both general and al.

Major Birdsall has entertained St. tersburg with a human-interest edirial page written by himself under the e "Uncle Frank." Sometimes this page s a sledge-hammer blow. Invariably, the first edition of the News, intended street sale, the editorial occupies the it page of the paper. In later editions s run as the back page.

The News is printed on white, peach l pink paper, and Major Birdsall said this writer that the press run was 000. The paper appears to be well ronized by advertisers. It maintains a carrier system and delivers in the ntry by bicycle and motor cycle, claimservice over two counties.

One of Major Birdsall's audacious enprises in St. Petersburg was publican, in one of the first numbers of the w daily of a Sunday morning extra ering a hurricane story, the paper be- sold at the doors of churches, to the azement of the town.

The newspaper office is located in a lding formerly used as a clubhouse. It centrally located. At the rear of the lding a cleverly devised mechanical nt has been constructed, equipped with dern machinery. From present apprances St. Petersburg News is one the sure-fire tabloids of the country.

A YEAR ago Andrew Carter, formerly publisher of the Arcadia Enterprise, ted the Tri-City Morning News, to ve the triplet cities of Bradenton, Palto and Manatee, located in the beautiful Manatee River section of the Florida West Coast. The paper has enjoyed a phenomenal growth.

"Yearly contracts for advertising now in hand will pay the operating costs of the business with a margin, let alone transient business," said Mr. Carter, adding, "When Horace Greeley gave his famous advice to young men he meant the West Coast of Florida."

Twins Bought Daily for $2,500; Last Year Refused $450,000

THE story of the twin brother publishers of the Orlando Reporter-Star has no equal in journalism. The twins are J. Clement Brossier and R. B. Brossier, born at Key West in 1893. They started business life as carriers of a Key West paper and as mere children printed a little sheet of their own, which they delivered by pony cart. Some of the tricks of the trade they learned on Mr. Shutts's Miami Herald.

In 1914 these brothers, just coming of age and so well matched in physical appearance as to keep even close friends puzzled, paid a visit to the rich inland section of the state where garden truck, melons, strawberries, grapes and citrus fruits grew in magical confusion. Orlando's population then was less than 5,000. The Reporter-Star was for sale. It was a four-page paper staggering under the weight of a payroll of $100 a week. The proprietor had had enough and offered the sheet for $2,500, about half down, and the Brossier twins took it over, their combined capital in bank, after their first payment had been made, being just $125. "And that was some investment for us to make at that time," said J. Clement, "for we had earned that money picking berries and peddling papers."

The Brossier administration of the paper started with one linotype, an old Babcock press, a shirt-tail of type, a snack of paper and ink and day and night work for the twins, each of whom went down on the payroll with a smash of $15 per Saturday night if business had been good.

Here is the Reporter-Star situation today: Orlando has become the inland metropolis of the state, as bright and bustling a city as one will find even in wonderful Florida, with more than 25,000 population, handsomely paved streets, lovely homes, smart stores and hotels, a huge agricultural "back country," plenty of work for everyone who will work and fun for those who must play, and signs of prosperity on every hand. The Reporter-Star averages 32 pages every evening and 60 pages on Sundays, 60 per cent advertising, of which 85 per cent is local, with a well equipped plant, including an art and photo-engraving department. The circulation is much better than the last six-months' A. B. C. figure, the twins proudly tell you, and the payroll today exceeds $4,000 a week.

In 12 years this newspaper has leaped into the class doing a gross business in excess of $300,000, which represents 25 times the volume that obtained during the first year of the twins' proprietorship.

Last March an offer of $450,000 was made for the Reporter-Star, but the twins had not the slightest notion of parting with their paper. Like almost everyone else in Florida, they have also dabbled in real estate and their fortune today is sizable. They are about to start two new papers in nearby cities, Melbourne and Vero Beach, each to be published in new local plants. Both will be called Journal and the Melbourne paper at the start will appear as a tri-weekly.

That the Brossier brothers are keen newspaper men was shown by an incident some months ago. Some of the local real estate operators settled on the queer conceit that a local newspaper should confine its advertising to local accounts, and when the Brossier brothers declined to turn down out-of-town real estate advertising Orlando real estate men combined to stay out of the Reporter-Star. The Brossiers made the issue plain, saying that the policy of the paper was to accept accounts from any legitimate advertiser, and put the pointed question to the local realtors: "Would you not deal for profit in land outside of Orlando?" Of course they would, and when the injustice of the boycott was made clear the problem was quickly solved by the return of the business with as much alacrity as it had departed.

The Reporter-Star is a good paper to read. It has a live wire editorial department. Watch these Brossier twins build a string of dailies in Florida—they typify the spirit of Florida and journalism to them is true romance!

Cartoonist Found Fortune In Orlando's Morning Paper

FROM newspaper cartoonist on the starvation pay of $27.50 per week to proprietorship of one of the most successful newspapers in Florida, one-half interest of which brought $250,000 in a sale last July, all within 12 years, is the thrilling story of W. M. Glenn, editor and publisher of the Orlando Sentinel, published morning and Sunday, and circulated over the handsome city and rich country side of famous Orange County.

Mr. Glenn started his career on the Indianapolis Star as cartoonist and reporter, incidentally selling some of his sketches at $1 per each to the Chicago Herald and N. E. A. Service. An associate and friend was W. C. Essington, for years connected with the Noblesville (Ind.) Journal. These young men married young women who had been classmates in a university located near Orlando, Fla., and in 1914 they gratified the wishes of their brides by bringing them to the sunshine state for a holiday. Naturally they inspected the local newspaper offices and ambition flared up in their minds when they learned that the Orlando Sentinel, a morning paper, might be purchased for a small sum, considerably under $50,000, on easy terms.

The Sentinel was then a four-six-eight-page paper, six columns in width, with a net paid circulation of 850, and was offering advertising at the startling figure of one cent per inch. The chief income was from legal notices and the publisher was largely concerned with his job printing department.

The bridal couples returned to Indiana deeply impressed by the glories of the soil in the Orlando country and ambitious to return. By the good old process of rake and scrape they gathered together sufficient funds to make the down payment and soon returned to operate the Sentinel as a progressive newspaper worthy of the thriving community.

"We had one linotype machine and a pile of junk in the press room," said Mr. Glenn to EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "My partner and I had practically no capital, but we managed to get along without borrowing money to sustain our investment. But in those early days $5 paid out of the cash box seemed an extravagance, no matter what it was intended to buy. We did everything on the newspaper that was to be done, outside the mechanical department.

"However, from the start we found this community alive and responsive. The local industries make Orlando as solid as any city in this country. The population has multiplied at least eight times. It has been one of the most thrilling experiences that a newspaper man could imagine to witness the development of this city. Orlando is a natural gateway to the state and many thousands of people who came here expecting to journey on to other sections of the state became fascinated by the city's charms and opportunities became permanent residents."

From the modest beginning of 1914 the Sentinel has been transformed into a metropolitan morning and Sunday newspaper, expertly edited, handsome in dress and noted throughout the state for its progressive policies. The daily averages from 16 to 36 pages, whereas the Sunday paper runs from 64 to 90 pages. The minimum advertising rate is 40 cents an inch. Mr. Glenn told EDITOR & PUBLISHER that the circulation of his daily paper is now 10,800 with the circulation of the Sunday paper in excess of 13,000.

In July, 1925, Mr. Essington told Mr. Glenn that certain Orlando interests had desired to buy his half interest in the Sentinel and as Mr. Essington had become interested in a profitable real estate venture which would take all of his time he was inclined to sell. Mr. Glenn promptly offered his partner $250,000 for his half interest in the Sentinel and the deal was promptly consummated leaving Mr. Glenn sole proprietor. From a source close to Mr. Glenn it was learned that the $27.50 per week cartoonist of 1914 had been able to pay more than half of the quarter million dollars for his partner's interest in cash.

The Sentinel is well equipped with a modern plant and housed in the center of the city.

Mr. Glenn was the first president of Sigma Delta Chi. He is the president of the Florida Press Association and is past president of the Associated Press Clubs of Florida. He is a leader of civic movements. The policies of his paper are rigidly independent.

"No man can see what I have seen in Florida and lack belief in her future of greatness," said Mr. Glenn. "The opportunities for success in Florida are numberless. Every day we learn of some new marvel and any man possessed of health and courage and the spirit to win can build his fortunes on this soil."

News Tower a Landmark In Miami

FROM any road leading to wonderful Miami the visitor beholds the stately million-dollar, 17-story tower of the Miami News, Gov. James M. Cox's great evening and Sunday paper, started as a weekly paper in 1896 with 300 circulation, now one of the leading papers of the state, possessed of a unique plant and the handsomest office edifice in the South, if not the nation.

The last available A. B. C. audit for the News gave it better than 25,000, but its general manager, Ross A. Reeder, informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER that the circulation averaged 46,000, covering a trading radius from Palm Beach to Homestead. Its average number of pages on week days is 54, with 136 on Sunday, Mr. Reeder said. It was fifth in the nation, in the 7-day field, last year's linage record, amassing the startling total of 27,041,223.

To celebrate the opening of its huge building the News published the record large paper of American history, so far as is known, a total of 504 pages, weighing 8 pounds per copy. This Jumbo number was printed with 20 sections of 24 pages, one of 16, each with a four color cover, and an added eight pages of colored comics. The issue retailed at 25 cents per copy, 50 cents by mail. Later it sold at a premium of $12 a copy.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER recently described in detail the Miami News building. The printing department is wholly separate from the office building, but the huge press room is in plain view of the counting room, the latter looking more like a Spanish cathedral than a commercial institution. The plant is new throughout and plainly represents heavy investment. It includes a gravure press among many novelties.

One hundred feet is the width of St. Petersburg's Central Avenue, seven miles long from Tampa Bay to Boca Ciega bay, lighted by a white way system the entire length. Some of the trees are by night illuminated by hundreds of vari-colored incandescent bulbs.

Morton M. Milford, the editor, is well known at Washington where he formerly represented the Louisville Courier-Journal. He is surrounded by a large staff. Gov. Cox spends considerable time in Miami, but is loyal to Ohio for citizenship. He gives the Miami News three hours a day of his time.

The News employs a total of 275 persons, exclusive of circulators, and its payroll has increased 1,000 per cent, Mr. Reeder said, since the day Gov. Cox bought it. One of the editorial features is daily publication of two specially wired New York World pages of news for the interest of visiting New Yorkers. The News is handsomely illustrated in its own plant, photography being one of its strong appeals. Reporters and photographers travel in red News coupes. The Sunday News is a model of fine typography and the editorial sections are notably complete.

Young Papers Share Success In Magic Miami

HERE is a success snap-shot enacted in Miami, which ranks among journalistic novelties. In March, 1924, a gentleman named Jarrell conceived the notion that Miami needed a new daily and gathered together in the corner of an old ice house a flat-bed press and two linotypes, and promptly ran out of money before getting under way. He named the paper the Tribune and proposed to enter the six-day evening field.

Sixty miles to the north, at Palm Beach, two years before, F. P. Fildes, a live-wire newspaper man with experience gained in New York, Tulsa, Joplin and Fort Worth, had started a daily, the Palm Beach Times. Just how Fildes learned of Jarrell's plight is not clear to this writer, but they met and Jarrell sold his interest.

Mr. Fildes, a native Floridian, went to work to make a newspaper suitable to thriving Miami. He told this writer that he had invested nearly all of his savings in the Palm Beach property and started in Miami with practically no capital but faith.

The Miami Tribune, in exactly two years, has developed business which sustains an average size of 32 pages, carrying in 1925, according to its publisher, approximately 9,000,000 lines of paid advertising, the open rate being ten cents. Mr. Fildes said: "The Tribune circulation has been gained at the rate of 1,000 per month and is now 21,000 in Greater Miami."

Recently the Tribune as a stunt published a gravure section of 60 pages, with a gross advertising income, Mr. Fildes said, of $60,000—the largest single sale of advertising in the history of the city, he declared.

The Tribune is in process of installing a new mechanical equipment. It runs 5 editions daily and distributes with a fleet of 20 trucks. It is a five-cent paper.

Mr. Fildes' start of the Palm Beach Times, morning and Sunday, was almost as theatrical as the Miami venture. He found it necessary to meet threatened competition to start in a hurry and purchased equipment in Chicago which he placed in a box car. Railroads were induced to expedite delivery, and at Palm Beach the publisher set up his plant in an unfinished warehouse. The first issue surprised the town. John Temple Graves, II, edits the Times.

Recently Mr. Fildes formed the Southern Publishing Company, which took over both the Miami and Palm Beach properties. There is a bond issue of $1,000,000 to pay for development of the papers. Mr. Fildes said that the assets of the two publications now exceeded by $700,000 their liabilities. A one-third interest in the Tribune was bought by Mr. Fildes from a former partner some months ago for $200,000.

The Tribune and Times are progressive in policy and liberal purchasers in the news market. Associated with Mr. Fildes on the Tribune are: T. L. Fortune, general manager; Vernon Knowles, editor; T. M. Arnold, managing editor; H. W. Potter, advertising manager; Ray Krim, city editor; John Wren, mechanical superintendent; George Coup, circulation manager. Ed. F. FLORIDA AGGRESSIVE FOR HONEST BUSINESS

Fraudulent Traders Have Been Largely Driven from State and Leaders Seek Better Business Bureaus' Aid to Protect Outside Investors

By HERBERT S. HOUSTON

Former President of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, and Member of the Executive Board of the National Better Business Bureau

WILL ROGERS told a Florida audience the other night that he had just bought a lot and marked it with buoys out in the bay. And the famous humorist's joke might easily have been the truth, for it is typical of the most stirring and interesting community of people that can be found today any place in the world.

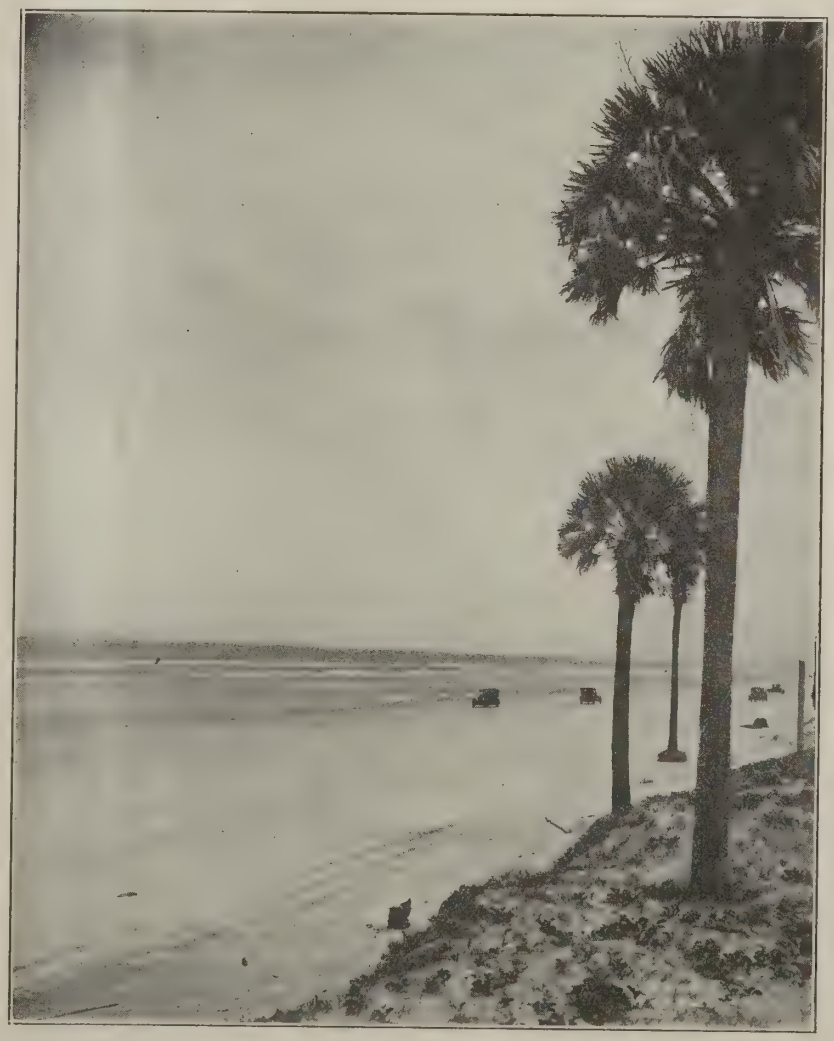
HERBERT S. HOUSTON

Even as the rollicking wit threw his "lariat," the surface of Davis Shores was emerging above the waters near St. Augustine and the little archipelago of islands of the same name rode proudly at anchor in Tampa Bay. All of them had been created, literally, from the sea. Their courageous builder had had a dream that many people thought fantastic, but it has come true.

If I were asked to hit off Florida in a line I'd tell Will Rogers' story and then paraphrase the title of my old friend Arthur Goodrich's play, "So This is Florida."

For the most interesting thing in Florida is the people. They are in fact "all sorts and conditions of men" and they have come from the ends of the earth. Moreover, they have come with amazing speed—probably a million in this present year. People are apt to think when they hear Florida called "the last frontier" that it is being settled as the receding frontier has been settled always, from colonial times, slowly, painfully, and with all manner of ups and downs. But Florida has been rushed from the "frontier," as if by air mail. There has been such swiftness about it you are left breathless. And then it dawns on you at last that this is the air mail age, so that Florida's development, in being swift, is perfectly normal and natural.

Henry M. Flagler was the real builder of the new Florida. He projected its spirit when he flung his railroad across the sea to Key West. In a very real way he then set the pace for the Davises, the Merricks, the Carl Fishers, the Youngs, the Knights, the Hoovers, the Barron Colliers and all that have come after. Flagler and his competitor on the West Coast, Henry B. Plant, have now bearers of their own spirit in Wardeld of the Seaboard and the executive heads of the other railroads that have rushed into the State. But Flagler and Plant imparted their spirit not merely to the railroad men, but to all the business men of Florida. There is a combination of courage and vision in the business men of the State which it would be hard to match any other place in the world. They have an unbounded vision as to the future of Florida and they have the courage to take the steps necessary to fulfill that vision.



Right here I think is the place for me to give an illustration of that combination of vision and courage which was most convincing to me and which I think will be convincing to everyone who may chance to read this article. In Jacksonville a few days ago I was asked to meet the directors of the State Chamber of Commerce. These men I found were earnestly determined to rid Florida of any land sharks or irresponsible business men of any sort who might be operating within the State. They were interested in having the active co-operation of the National Better Business Bureaus, with which I have always been closely associated, in doing this important job.

But the point I want particularly to make is that they had taken the initiative in wanting to have the job done and that our help was sought in the way of co-operation, especially throughout the rest of the country. The result of our negotiations was that an alliance was effected between the State Chamber and the National Better Business Bureau by which we are to work shoulder to shoulder in helping Florida set her own house in order.

Unfortunately, some wholly misleading press reports were sent out which were calculated to make it appear that Florida was in a very bad way and needed to cry aloud for outside help. This, of course, is the farthest removed from the fact and the truth. Business in Florida, as I took occasion to say a number of times, is carried on in upright fashion. The business men of the State maintain as high ethical standards as in any other states.
worthy of the highest praise. The evening of the day on which the alliance was effected I was asked to broadcast a little talk from the Jacksonville municipal radio station. In that talk, after describing the plan that had been agreed upon, I said:

"This marks an important forward movement in American business. A great state, through its own citizens, supplies definite information to all the world on the character of the business done within its borders. Surely Florida could do no more. No other part of the world, since commerce began, has done so much. This action will appeal to the sense of fair play of the entire country. People everywhere will say that Florida is meeting the question of unreliable business with courage and candor. Those who ever maligned the State will be made ashamed and all others will applaud."

It is interesting to tell the thousands of newspaper men who read EDITOR & PUBLISHER that three days after this alliance was effected Ponzi had been arrested and indicted and is now awaiting trial on the charge of having developed a fraudulent land scheme. Other cases are being considered. The work for the National Better Business Bureau is in charge of John Garver, who made a high record of efficiency as the head of the Buffalo Better Business Bureau. He has his office with the State Chamber of Commerce in Jacksonville and is working hand in glove with the State Chamber and the one hundred and seventy-six local Chambers scattered all over the State. He will have such support from the National Better Business Bureau in New York as he may require. The sensational report was published in some of the Florida papers that "squads of investigators" were to be rushed to Florida to clean up the State. Of course, such a statement is preposterous.

Nothing between you and heaven on these wide sweeping beaches, where the automobile may run for as high as 50 miles on sand as hard as cement, royal palms fringing the shore. This beach is the pride of Jacksonville.

The great body of business in Florida, whether real estate or of every other character, is sane and honest and needs investigation no more than business in any other state needs it. Mr. Garver is a man of poise and sound judgment, and he will ask for only such co-operation outside the State as may be necessary. But a certain amount of co-operation outside of Florida will be necessary, due to the fact that Florida real estate is now sold in a national market. Through the forty-four Better Business Bureaus, scattered all over the country, it will now be possible for Florida to help protect innocent investors who are the victims of misrepresentation in other parts of the country. That is really the very great service which the National Better Business Bureau is to render the alert and honest business men of Florida.

Not only is the State Chamber of Commerce deeply interested in this whole question, but the State Real Estate Board is equally interested. And that prompts me to say that this Real Estate Board has done the most progressive thing I have known to be done in any state; this has been in the success of its endeavor to get a licensing law through the State legislature, by which every realtor has to operate under a state license, subject to cancellation. This enlightened statute immediately drove from the State a great many irresponsible speculators and it has given to the honest realtors an effective weapon to help them in protecting the good name of the State. But the one part of the protective work which Florida sincerely wished to do was left unprovided for; this was protection to the thousands of investors in Florida real estate outside the State. That protection, as I have just explained, is now to be provided through this alliance that is already in operation with the Better Business Bureaus.

In my long association with the Truth Movement of the Associated Advertising Clubs, I have seen the business men of many different parts of the country in action in behalf of honest business. But I am quite within the mark in saying that I have never before seen men who were more clear-headed or more determined than are the business men of Florida; and of course I include the publishers of Florida in that classification. The State Chamber is fortunate in having a singularly sane and well-poised executive secretary in Abel A. Coult. He simply refuses to be frightened by bluff or bluster and insists on letting the facts determine action. He has the good fortune to have as his associate Dr. H. R. McKeen, the State Financial Director of the Chamber, who is a flaming crusader for righteousness everywhere. I heard him make three or four talks while in Florida and there is no one in the country who can make a straight-from-the-shoulder, two-fisted appeal to business men more effectively than he can make it. With these two executive leaders, backed by a strong board of directors, under the chairmanship of Herman Dann of St. Petersburg, the rest of the country can be assured that the business men of Florida are to be wisely guided. And of course it should be added that the State Realty Board is a powerful ally in this important work.

The most vivid impression that I have borne away from Florida is that the men whose stake in Florida is the greatest have such an abiding confidence in the State's future that they are not going to let that future be limited by unfair practice or by misrepresentation. That is a huge quality printing establishment, doing a business that extends far to the North. The paper is replete with telegraph and local news, the pick of the country's features, and its advertising patronage has more than doubled in recent months. The editor and manager is Lt. Col. Herbert Felkel, also manager of the big printing establishment. The managing editor is Nina S. Hawkins, one of the notable women newspaper successes of the South.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

Population—Accurate data on the population of Florida cities have been extremely difficult to obtain, principally because of the tremendous daily influx of new people, many of them tourists, but a great number new permanent residents. The 1925 State Census has been generally repudiated by Florida newspaper men, civic officials, and chambers of commerce as misrepresenting the true population. It was taken in midsummer, they point out, adding that July, 1925, was the least suitable month of last year for an accurate enumeration. The population figures in the table on Page XVI, which are taken from this census (indicated by a "25"), should be increased by 10 per cent for present population. The smaller and newer cities, for which no enumeration was made in 1925, have been credited with populations on the basis of the best local authorities.

Principal Industries—This data is indicated in the table on Page XVI by letter-keys, which refer to the information on this and the opposite page under the name of each city.

"The big news of St. Augustine is the story of Florida's development," said the editor. "The Record has, of course, played its part in the state building campaign. St. Augustine is the next step southward from Jacksonville and the stream of tourists has been pouring through here in unbroken flood, thousands being so charmed by the ancient glories and modern luxuries and business advantages of this city that they have remained, accounting for the remarkable multiplication of the population of this community during the past two or three years. Naturally, our paper has kept pace with this movement and, as you see, it has taken on the proportions of a metropolitan daily. It is prosperous and so is every other business institution in St. Augustine. We feel that St. Augustine is destined to grow to immense proportions. It has all of the necessary attractions.

"The true modern founder of Florida, the late Henry M. Flagler, made St. Augustine his home and railroad building headquarters and his remains lie over there in that church yard, under the palms. One of the interesting features of life here is the devotion of the citizens to the city. It is akin to the love of a child for a parent. I believe there is no more romantic city in America, certainly none of greater physical charm. We are building land in St. Augustine Bay and this water-front will presently be the most beautiful in the world. The sand-sucker dredge not only provides home sites for those who enjoy living at the water's edge, but clears the ugly marsh land and makes a clean shore line. Our hotels are magnificent and whereas, in the past, we have looked upon the tourist season as of the Winter only, it has gradually extended throughout the entire year, and mid-summer in St. Augustine life is now comparable to mid-winter of a half dozen years ago. Our shopping district contains many fine quality stores. Everyone is prosperous and the city is liberal in its support of the state movement. Many newspaper and advertising men visit the city and all are welcome at the Record office."

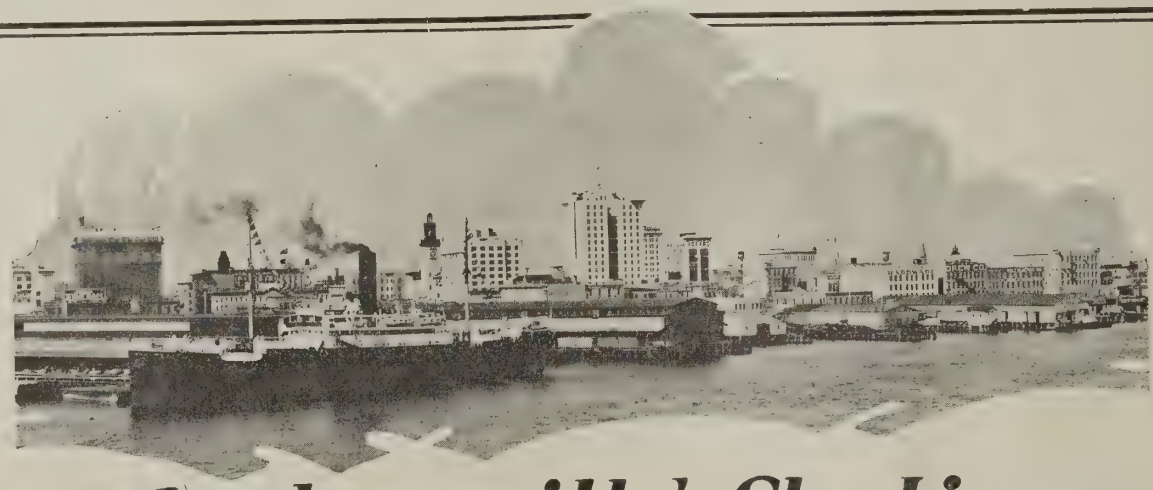
Phosphate's "White Gold" Plant City's Riches

ARTHUR G. IVEY, an experienced young newspaper man, possessing the rare combination of talents that make him at home in business and editorial departments, purchased the semi-weekly Plant City Courier in November, 1925.

You know that you are in a daily newspaper office of importance when you step into his shop today. The Courier is published mornings seven days a week now, bulges with advertising, carries a full telegraph report and features galore, is a live local news centre, prints punchy local editorials and has a circulation reaching near to 2,000.



This is the feat of a newspaper man over a period of only four months. Mr. Ivey is active in the co-operative journalism of the state, an intelligent booster of his own community, a builder and withal a calm and modest individual. He tells the visitor of the huge resources of the countryside, which includes the largest phosphate beds known in this country. White gold will come from those mines for perhaps a century. Plant City's immediate trading area boasts 10,000 or more people today; two years ago it was reported at less than half that number of people. The town is particularly interesting because of its stable all-the-year commercial qualities.

Lakeland Papers Advance In 7-League Boots

AMONG the 13 palm fringed lakes of Lakeland, a rapidly building city near the center of Florida, the visitor finds two busy newspaper offices. Like so many other newspapers in Florida they have risen from obscurity to importance and prosperity within a span of two or three years.

Earl Mullen is general manager and Sam M. Farabee is editor of the Lakeland Ledger, evening and Sunday. Mr. Mullen is of the famous Mullen family of newspaper folk. His brother, Charles G. Mullen, is general manager of the Tampa Times. Another brother, John M. Mullen, is publisher of the Florida Grower, an immense agricultural paper, printed brilliantly with liberal use of color, leading in its field, extraordinarily prosperous and maintaining a fine plant at Tampa. Another brother is Ed F. Mullen, a youth, employed in the editorial department of Tampa Times. Maude R. Mullen, a sister, edits and publishes a prosperous semi-

Miami's Welcome to the World

THROUGH the medium of The Miami Herald the world is in constant touch with the wonders and progress of the Magic City. It is the "Door-way" to the vast opportunities of Miami and Southern Florida . . . . an aggressive, constructive institution for the upbuilding of city and state.

Each day the news and commercial activities of Miami and Florida are broadcasted through the columns of the Herald . . . . . inviting, teaching, educating and inspiring Miamians, and the Nation as well, to a greater appreciation and realization of the opportunities and possibilities of the new Florida.

That Herald readers realize the tremendous prestige and influence of this newspaper as a power for good is manifested by the fact that the Herald has the largest circulation in Miami and Lower East Coast Territory, and leads the world in total advertising lineage. This leadership has not come about by chance . . . . . but is the direct result of years of constructive building, in keeping with this organization's determination to make The Miami Herald truly "Miami's Welcome To The World."

weekly newspaper at Lincolnton, N. C., the family home.

The population of Lakeland has doubled since 1924 and the business of the Ledger has walked in seven league boots, since it was started on August 2, 1924. It is said that the paper made more money in its first six months of life than the total investment. Its gross business in 1925 was something like a quarter of a million dollars. The paper has demanded cash for advertising, Mr. Mullen said, and its reply to advertisers who have asked for land trades, he declares, has been that a newspaper must operate upon a cash basis.

"The circulation of the Ledger," said Mr. Mullen, "has been developed through a boy delivery system. There have been no contests. We started an 8-page paper with 12 employees. The total number on the payroll now is 74. This city is in the heart of the citrus belt and possesses peculiar charm because it is situated amid 13 lakes, adding coolness to the summer charm. The town is remarkably ambitious, even for Florida, and is very responsive to newspaper service. Lakeland is destined to be a great city."

This publisher, who appears under 30 years of age, has had a previous newspaper success. Before coming to Florida he bought a weekly at Hickory, N. C., converted it into a daily and 18 months later sold it for $16,000, meanwhile drawing salary at the rate of $5,000 per year.

The Lakeland Star-Telegram, morning and Sunday, ably edited and managed, has scored a consistent success record. The managing publisher is L. W. Bloom, one of the two-fisted newspaper men of the state, who practises in Lakeland editorial independence of the first water and has established for the paper a reputation for character and enterprise. Mr. Bloom came to Florida in 1916, the Star being his first venture. He said that the paper became profitable in the third month. He brought about a consolidation of his paper with the Telegram in 1922.

The consolidated newspaper has driven ahead at a lively clip during the past two years, in fact it outgrew three presses in a twelve-month and when this writer called at the office last week one discarded press was on the sidewalk awaiting trucks to carry it away.

The average number of pages of the daily is 32, with 72 the average Sunday size. "We ran over 8000 inches of paid space last Sunday," said Mr. Bloom. "Our general advertising rates are 56 cents for the daily and 60 cents for the Sunday. We started newspaper operations in Lakeland with mechanical equipment which can only be described as a bunch of junk, but the present plant is modern in every detail. The problem here is to keep up to the requirements of the public."

Mr. Bloom and Harry Brown, the editor, have a well serviced newspaper and go strongly into local affairs, and the newspaper is credited locally with some excellent pieces of courageous enterprise.

The gross business of the Star-Telegram in the year 1925 was just six and a half times greater than in 1913, the publisher said.

When News Is Light, They Count the Bath Tubs

DOWN in the rich Everglades country the traveler finds one of the curiosities of American journalism.

If the automobile is speeding at 40 there is danger of completely overlooking the town of Canal Point, for its total population cannot be in excess of 250. However, one of the best weekly newspapers in the state or the South is produced here. It finds support, of course, among the well-to-do tillers of the black muck of the Everglades and the men who have come to open this amazingly fertile land for farming by a system of drainage canals. The weekly newspaper is Everglades News and its editor is Howard Sharp, a clever writer and enterprising publisher. His paper is profitable. The most recent enterprise of the Canal Point Everglades News was to take a census of the bath-tubs in the community. Mr. Sharp announced editorially that wash tubs or tin tubs would not be counted as bath tubs. He asked his readers to "come clean" in reporting installation of bonafide tubs for bathing purposes only.

Canal Point is on the famous "Fingy" Connors highway on the south-east side of Lake Okeechobee.

Palm Beach Has Factories As Well as Fun Shops

THEY tell you that the principal industries of Palm Beach, or West Palm Beach as it is officially known, are citrus fruit growing, lumber, sugar refining, general agriculture and the manufacture of paving material, but this writer knows from observation that the leading businesses are dancing, singing, dressing, dining, bathing and having a very good time under the open skies.

Clustered about the town are some 25,000 people, living in hotels, magnificent villas and pretty bungalows, shaded by palms whose symmetrical trunks raise their green umbrellas to the clouds.

The town is busy and among all of the activities nothing is livelier in the winter season than the newspaper offices, one of which is presided over by a clever newspaper woman, Ruby Edna Pierce, famous in the state for both clever executive business ability and an agile editorial pen. She is officially editor, managing editor, city editor, and general manager of the Palm Beach News, which is published during the Winter season by Oscar G. Davis who is also advertising manager. If there is any important activity in Palm Beach that the editress and manager is not personally consulted about, it just isn't important.

The all-year dailies in West Palm Beach are the Post, morning and Sunday, with A. B. C. circulation rating around 10,000, published by D. H. Conkling and edited by Vernon L. Smith, and the Times, occupying the evening field, with Sunday edition, claiming 8,500 to 10,500 circulation, edited by John Temple Graves II, and owned by the Southern Publishing Company, of which F. P. Fildes, of the Miami Tribune, is president. The exciting story of the starting and development of the Times is elsewhere noted in this number.

Falls Wanted to Farm, But Ft. Pierce Record Lured

SIX years ago there came to Fort Pierce an aggressive young man of 22. As he wandered up the sandy streets of an all but deserted fishing village and drank in the beauty of the morning sun, he mused "Utopia—why should I go on?"

Today this same young man, Robert E. Falls, is publisher of the Fort Pierce Record, a seven-day morning newspaper of expanding influence in the central east coast of Florida.

"Bob" Falls slipped from the bonds of paternal care in New Orleans when hardly more than a boy. From New York City an occasional letter went home to the Crescent City. He was a composing room foreman on a New York paper, then the owner of a Long Island job shop and weekly, and he was not twenty.

Then the war came. "I paid no attention to the whole mess," the youthful publisher recently confessed, "until one day I learned that an old buddy had been mangled with shrapnel. Then I took a train to Montreal and enlisted with the first Canadian contingent to go over."

Fall's war experience was that of a roving, fighting private, once staff writer for the famous Star & Stripes. With the armistice newspaper work somehow sent out a call to him. We next find him in Jacksonville, where both editorial and composing rooms of two daily newspapers sought him. Two years later St. Lucie County offered up the richness of soil, the most fertile in the world, to the wayfarer. He became owner of large groves of citrus. But still journalism lured him. A broken-down job shop was for sale at Fort Pierce and it seemed just natural that his hand should want to slip into type cases. With a job shop a weekly newspaper seemed to be the necessary thing and in eight months the St. Lucie County Weekly was one of the largest sheets of its kind in Florida.

In October of 1925 the field outgrew the weekly and Falls launched the Ft. Pierce Morning Record. In four months, this newspaper claimed a larger circulation than any other paper between Palm Beach and Daytona with advertising linage greater than that of scores of old-established city newspapers in the North.

A new building, in which the Record is to be housed, is nearly completed and machine equipment for a large daily is awaiting completion of the structure.

The evening paper at Fort Pierce is the News-Tribune, which is now just one year old. It is one of the soundest successes among the flock of new papers. The News-Tribune was started by G. R. Nottingham with C. S. Miley as associate editor. Mr. Nottingham soon retired and took up his profession as an attorney. The paper is now under the editorship of Thomas J. Bryson. The News-Tribune takes a leading part in the development of the city and county. The paper is an active force in local politics, lending its influence to any progressive movement.

Old Daytona Beach Papers Alert to New Day

DAYTONA BEACH, among the most magnificent of Florida cities, world-famous for its wide sweep of brick-hard shore front, has three newspapers, the Journal, morning and Sunday, published by Horace E. Loomis; the News, published evenings and Sunday by T. E. Fitzgerald; and the recently started Tribune, published by Frank Jones, also in the evening field.

The experience of Mr. Fitzgerald, a pioneer in the local newspaper field, indicates the amazing press development in this center. Mr. Fitzgerald is a lawyer by profession and a publisher by choice. The News was established as a weekly in 1890. Mr. Fitzgerald bought it in 1901. From an insignificant paper he has made it one of the notable successes of Florida. "I did all the work myself in the early days," he said, as he was displaying to EDITOR & PUBLISHER a payroll of 70 employees of the present day. The circulation of the weekly was a doubtful 300 and Mr. Fitzgerald declared that the press run on the day that this writer called was over 7,200. The tiny four-pager has become a 32-page daily and 5 to 60 pages Sunday, brimming with news and features and advertising, both commercial and real estate.

For the past four months, October, November, December and January, THE TIMES has averaged 1,702,809 lines monthly—nearly TWO MILLION LINES OF ADVERTISING PER MONTH—publishing SIX DAYS A WEEK ONLY. This is eloquent testimony of the esteem in which this medium is held by both local and national advertisers. Because of its superior editorial appeal, its complete coverage, its high standards of service, and the fact that it goes into thousands of homes of prosperity and keen buying judgment each evening makes it a power for the advertising stories printed in its columns.

ADVERTISERS KNOW THAT "THE TIMES" OFFERS THE ONLY OPPORTUNITY TO COVER FLORIDA'S LARGEST CITY AND ITS TRADING TERRITORY AT A SINGLE COST!

The Tampa Territory is enjoying a great era of prosperity and expansion. Large industries are building splendid plants, thousands of skilled workmen are building permanent homes, bank resources constantly break and re-break former records and business houses are building new and larger quarters, while railroads and steamship lines are feverishly expanding their services to meet the situation. Here is a rich and responsive market reached at the moment of the buying mood—eventide—through the columns of the newspaper that makes a universal appeal to the masses as well as the classes.

NEWSPAPERS WON FORTUNE

The Daytona Beach Journal, published mornings and Sunday, is now the property of Horace E. Loomis, and was described in detail in EDITOR & PUBLISHER for January 2, 1926, at the time of his purchase.

When this writer called at the office last week the Journal had just taken possession of its new building, a handsome concrete structure, centrally located, splendidly equipped and built at a cost of $150,000.

The paper was started 44 years ago as a weekly. It was typical of the sleepy journalism of Florida prior to the great awakening some three years ago. Since that time the paper has taken on the attributes of a metropolitan sheet. Indeed, the jump to the present size was made from an 8-page flat-bed press product in two years.

The Journal is largely staffed by former Miami News men, 14 of the number having been formerly been employed on Gov. Cox's big daily.

Associated with Mr. Loomis as business manager is R. H. Dunlap, a live-wire newspaper man with experience gained in newspaper service from Honolulu to Boston. The managing editor of the paper, Sam M. Ballard, hails from Indiana and has seen service on many newspapers of the Middle West and South.

Metropolitan Methods in DeLand, "Athens of Florida"

ON the Dixie Highway, 110 miles south of Jacksonville, the traveler finds the handsome, modern, thriving city of DeLand, called the "Athens of Florida," surrounded on every side by sweeping citrus groves, heavy with golden fruit, and farms cultivating flower bulbs, commercial ferns, nuts, live stock and a diversity of garden products. The town is also the centre of thriving fish, packing and cigar-making industries.

In five years DeLand has jumped from 3,324 population to more than 11,000.

Clayton C. Codrington, one of the best-known newspaper men of the state, has made his evening paper, the Daily News, a power in this rich community within three years.

From a four-pager it has become a 16 to 24-page sheet, which would do credit to any metropolitan city of triple the size of DeLand.

It is rich in news and feature service to readers. From relative obscurity this newspaper has been developed into the proportions of a very valuable property.

The Daily News publishes an average of nearly 1½ papers for every family in DeLand. It has a modern plant and is a liberal patron of the established news and feature services. However, it specializes in local news and is an intelligent advocate of civic improvements and industrial development. A. B. Codrington is advertising manager, J. Oren Hassell, associate editor, and E. Richardson, business manager.

"Highest Priced Paper in U. S." Is Sarasota Herald Claim

THERE are few neater or more efficient small newspaper plants in America than the one that has just been opened for Sarasota Herald, the morning and Sunday paper that was started five months ago by Paul Poynter, with George D. Lindsay, former president of the Inland Daily Press Association and publisher of the Marion (Ind.) Chronicle, as editor and general manager.

Mr. Lindsay went to Sarasota to buy a cottage and fell in love with the town and when the Herald venture was planned he was invited to edit and operate the paper.

The first number of the newspaper carried 7,700 inches of display matter in 80 pages. The paper came out on time, despite the fact that its stereotyping outfit had not arrived 36 hours before the publication hour.

The Herald building is fashioned in Spanish style, built of hollow tile and stucco, is 45 by 90 feet, cost $50,000 and is equipped with shiny new machinery, laid out in a straight line from business office to the newsboy's room. From the start the daily has averaged 20 pages, the Sunday 56, and the paper carries a full line of telegraph, local and feature material.

"The population of Sarasota," said Mr. Lindsay, "has grown to fully 15,000, whereas the Federal census of 1920 gave it only 2,250. We had 1,500 pledged subscribers before we actually got under way.

"The circulation of the daily is now 3,200 and that of the Sunday 4,000. We raised our local advertising rate from 42 cents to 50 cents per inch on Feb. 1. Our national rate is 56 cents. This is the highest priced newspaper of its class in the country, I believe. Our subscription rate is $10 a year, or 20 cents a week delivered. We deliver over a radius of 30 miles to the south and 50 miles to the north."

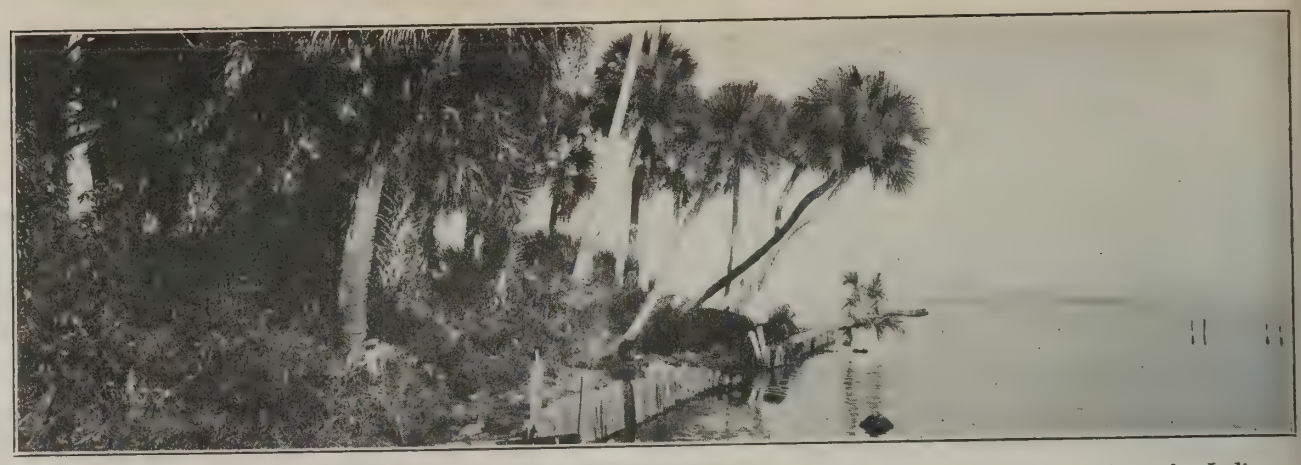
Palatka News Prospered Years Before Boom Came

ESTABLISHED 35 years ago as a weekly newspaper, the Palatka News about six years ago entered the daily field long before the so-called "real estate boom" had affected the central portion of Florida, and today it is a Putnam county institution strongly entrenched, and carrying a large volume of commercial advertising.

It has known but three part changes of ownership. It was established by M. M. Vickers and W. A. Russell, now state senator.

About five years ago, Senator Russell retired from the publishing business and his place was taken by Goode M. Guerry, formerly of the Tampa Tribune staff.

In the spring of 1925, Mr. Guerry severed his connection with the News and Calvert L. Estill became a part owner.



From the foundation of the publication to the present time, Mr. Vickers has been one of the proprietors. In length of service, he is one of the oldest newspaper men in the state, and is held in high esteem by the fraternity. He has published a paper devoted consistently to the best interests of Palatka and Putnam county and has had a large part in the building up of the section.

Mr. Estill was formerly one of John H. Perry's managing editors, and more recently the capital correspondent of the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer, and other newspapers owned and controlled by H. C. Ogden, of Wheeling.

The News has kept pace with the progress of the section in which it is published.

It is a liberal user of telegraph and feature service material and enjoys an unusual volume of foreign advertising.

Within a short time, the News expects to be in a new building constructed and owned by the newspaper, and to add greatly to its mechanical equipment.

Such tropical views are to be seen in ten thousand nooks and corners of romantic Dixie Highway along the Indian River on the East Coast.

Million Lines a Month Now Clearwater's Speed

CAPTAINED by one of the youngest publishers in the entire South, the Clearwater Sun, evening newspaper published at the county seat of Pinellas county, has tripled in size and circulation within the space of about fourteen months.

In December, 1924, this newspaper reported 1,400 circulation. It was a six-page daily. The closing month of that year found the paper publishing from eight to twelve pages with an occasional 16. Today the publisher claims circulation in excess of 4,500 with 20 to 24 pages daily with an occasional run of 28 to 32 pages. The Sun is one of the best serviced papers of its size in the state.

Business handled by the paper has almost tripled since 1924. In December, 1925, the paper carried more than one million lines of advertising in regular issues. No special editions were issued during that month.

From a staff of two in the news department and two in the business office in 1924, the force has been augmented to eight in the business office and eight in the news department.

The publisher, James R. Brumby, III, is now only 23 years of age. Ovid C. Lane, managing editor, is 30 years of age. Mr. Lane was formerly city editor of the St. Petersburg Times, previous to which he was city editor on the Evansville (Ind.) Journal. During the war he served with the morale department of the Surgeon General's office, U. S. Army, and assisted in establishing service newspapers in Washington, New York, Detroit, and Chicago.

Sarasota Times Would Grace City of 100,000 People

THE up-and-doing evening paper at Sarasota is the Times, publishing a lively Sunday edition, operated under the direction of L. D. Reagin, with Walter S. Adams as managing editor. The Florida rush and particularly the amazing two-year growth of Sarasota is reflected in the more than tripled opera-is the most talked of city in Florida to-day. During the year 1925 Fort Myers and Lee County doubled its population, and it is confidently predicted will increase at least 50% during the year 1926. Fort Myers is the centre of a trade territory embracing Lee, Charlotte, Hendry, Glades, and Collier counties. This territory is covered by and in this territory the Press has more paid subscribers than any other newspaper. In this field the Press on evenings six days in the week increased its advertising during the past year about 200%. In this field there is a market for almost every national product, and the best way to meet the market is through the advertising columns of THE FORT MYERS PRESS.

FORT MYERS, FLORIDA

tions of the Times. The newspaper is operated in a building located in the centre of the business district and its circulation spreads over a wide territory and is declared by its management to have more than doubled. The paper might be published in a northern city of 100,000 population. It is intensely local in flavor, but there is liberal use of metropolitan features and telegraph news. A strong local editorial policy is pursued.

Chief's Plant Ever Growing In Winter Haven

THE Winter Haven Daily Chief, published at Winter Haven, Polk County, is the outgrowth of the Florida Chief, established as a weekly in 1911 by M. M. Lee, formerly of St. Mary's, Kan. The paper's development has been coincident with the growth of the city. In 1921, the paper became a semi-weekly, in which field it remained until September, 1924, when the change was made to a six day afternoon issue.

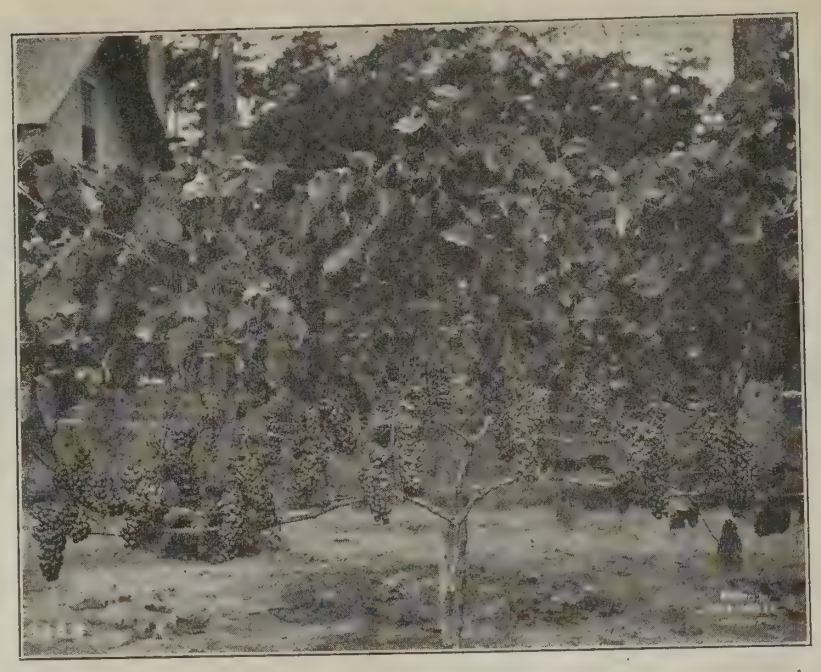
With the change to a daily issue, a large amount of new machinery was purchased, the building erected in 1915 having previously been enlarged, and Winter Haven's first daily newspaper was launched.

In February, 1925, the plant was visited by a fire, entailing a large loss and necessitating the remodeling of the building. Since that time, the paper's progress has been rapid, necessitating the addition of more machinery and the increase of the payroll until the end of the first year found more than 35 employees. That the paper exceeded the expectations of the publishers is shown by the fact that instead of holding the 8-page-a-day standard, which the publishers hoped to maintain the first year the average daily issue during 1925 was aproximately 12 pages, with many 16-page papers being issued.

Beginning with Sunday, February 7, 1926, the Chief began the publication of the Polk County Sunday Chief, a morning paper, launching this enterprise with a 36-page issue. The Sunday paper covers the entire lake and ridge sections while the afternoon daily maintains a circulation of over 3,000, which is rapidly increasing.

M. M. Lee is editor and proprietor, C. L. Lee, business manager, R. N. Haas, associate editor, and G. R. Moon, advertising manager.

Fort Myers' Progress Keeps Editors Stepping



IN the gay city of Fort Myers, metropolis of the southern west coast, George E. Hosmer, former president of the National Editorial Association and well known the country over, operates the Press, an evening paper, averaging 12 pages now, whereas, a year ago, it ran 4 pages with an occasional eight.

"The Press has gained every month that I have had it," said Mr. Hosmer. "I came to Florida seven years ago, settling at Bradenton, with the Journal as my property. I consolidated it with the Herald and then sold the property, coming to Fort Myers, where I purchased the Press. The paper has more than doubled its business. Fort Myers is in the heart of a rich section of the state and has a great future. I believe it is the prettiest town in Florida."

When Harrison Fuller took off a major's uniform following the World War and settled down to work in his home town, St. Paul, Minn., first with the Pioneer Press and later as a publicity man, he determined that as soon as possible he would buy his own paper.

Failing to find what he wanted in his own state he accompanied his father to Florida, somewhat for vacation purposes and somewhat with an eye open for a newspaper venture.

He purchased, on January 12, 1924, for a comparatively small sum, the Fort Myers Tropical News, which for many years had been operated by a family in a small way, occupying the morning and Sunday field. Mr. Fuller who looks like a happy boy and eats candy at his desk, sent for his friend, Carl Hanton, also a Pioneer Press editorial man, and the two started the Florida venture with a bang, Fuller as publisher and Hanton as editor.

Grape culture in Florida, a vast variety of species responding to intelligent growing.

The Tropical News runs an average of 14 pages daily, 32 pages on Sunday, is liberally serviced and carries at least 65 per cent advertising, three-quarters real estate. The boys from the West have tripled the newspaper's business and its payroll within a year, while the population of the town has more than doubled.

Prosperous Daily-Weekly Chain Serves Gainesville

ONE of the comparatively small dailies of Florida is the Evening News, Gainesville's leading boosting medium, which proclaims that it "covers Gainesville and Alachua County like sunshine." Elmer W. and Mrs. P. H. McCreary are owners of the McCreary Publications, publishers of the Evening News and numerous weekly publications throughout the county. Associated with them are Henry A. Stalls, assistant manager, and Mrs. Carrie T. McCreary, business manager. The News this year has been designated by both the city and county as the official organ to carry the delinquent tax lists. It is well served with news and features and during the past ten days has added more than 200 new subscribers.

Bailey's Hustling Daily Mid Eustis' Myriad Lakes

T. JEFF BAILEY, former reporter on the Nashvillle Banner, Atlanta Georgian, Birmingham Ledger and later city editor of Birmingham Age-Herald, is today sole proprietor of the Eustis Lake Region, which until 1923 had been published as a weekly. Mr. Bailey purchased the paper in December, 1924. The paper has a good plant, including a first-class job printing business.

Last September the Lake Region went into the Sunday morning field, eliminating the Saturday paper. The Sunday averages 20 pages and the daily eight. Everyone of the paper's staff is a member of the Jeff Bailey family, and you see a printer turning in a local story, and an editor interested in advertising. Mr. Bailey's motto is: "One for all—all for one." The paper has a constructive tone, bristles with advertising at a good rate and intensively covers the trading area scattered over the scenic high lands of Lake County. Lakes? Oh, yes, there are 1,400 of them—count 'em—in the county, no fewer than 20 within the city limits.

Paper for Every Three People In Stuart

ONE of the interesting successes in Florida journalism is the Stuart Daily News. In 1923 it was started as a weekly newspaper with five 18-inch columns. On October 8, 1925, the Messenger was converted into a daily under the name of the Stuart Daily News, published by the Clyma Publishing Company, Inc. The News met with favor from the first. Today it prints each evening more than 1,600 papers, with a net paid circulation of 1,588, a record, its owners believe, for any paper in a city of 5,000 population.

With more than $30,000 in machinery, printed in its own two-story modern plant, and with a weekly payroll of $1,500, the Daily News represents a far cry from the days of the old Weekly Messenger, with its weekly payroll of $100 and antiquated machinery.

The daily runs from 10 to 20 pages on a Cox Duplex press with two linotypes, one Ludlow, modern type racks, saw and stereotyping equipment. The job printing department also has grown apace, now having two modern job presses and a Miehle.

C. B. Clyma is publisher, E. R. Clyma, business manager, J. S. Hurley, editor and L. J. Maloney, advertising manager.

Haines City Herald Proud Of Its Plant

THE Haines City Daily Herald began publication Dec. 10, 1925, in one of the most modernly equipped small city newspaper plants in America. Previously, the Herald had been a weekly the last seven years under the management of M. J. Lee, its present publisher.

Successful as a weekly, the Daily Herald struck an instant chord of popularity and under vigorous editorial management has become one of the most extensively quoted newspapers in the state. Typographically, it has been credited with being the equal of many newspapers in cities several times the size of Haines City.

The Daily Herald assumed a militant editorial policy from the first and has built up enviable prestige. Both Mr. Lee and his editor, E. G. Denham, have been the recipients of congratulations from many parts of the country for being able to produce in a city of 4,000 population a daily newspaper in such modern physical dress and with such entertaining contents.

The Daily Herald's customary size is eight pages, although there are times when twelve and more pages are run

Covering a Newly Discovered Field

Florida has consistently broken so many records —building and otherwise—in the last few months that the unusual progress of its newspapers is taken as a matter of course.

That the National Advertisers are taking advantage of this newly found field is being demontrated daily by the increased number of Florida dailies being added to campaigns.

Clearwater, county seat of Peerless Pinellas County, becoming nationally known as the "Springtime City," with its more than $5,000,000 worth of building in 1925, has stepped into the front rank of Florida's progressive cities.

And Clearwater with its city and suburban population of more than 20,000 can be reached only through

South Florida's Eyes on Lauderdale's Growth

FORT LAUDERDALE on the East coast, north of Miami, is one of the most striking of all Florida's magic developments. The official Federal count of its people in 1920 registered 5,445; the state census of 1925 gave the town 22,500 and what has happened since then is best left to the local enthusiasts who believe that it is much, much better than 30,000 souls.

At any rate, it is a city of beautiful homes, wide and spotless streets, and to find a parking space in the center of the town after nine o'clock in the morning requires both skill and patience.

W. J. Galvin with his Fort Lauderdale News is setting such a fast pace in the evening and Sunday field that no one has seemed to care to give him competition.

The News is a first-class newspaper, brimming with readable material and positively embarrassed by advertising patronage at apparently profitable rates.

Even in Miami a perfectly loyal newspaper editor told this writer: "Watch Lauderdale grow!"

Wire News Heavy in Infant Sebring American

THE remarkable progress of the city of Sebring has been closely paralleled during the past five months by the breathless development of the Sebring Daily American.

The American is an evening paper with a Sunday edition and occupies the entire ridge section of Florida. Rapid growth of the American is attributed by the owners, Marion J. Sheen and Richard R. Tryon, to the fact that business men and the public in general of Sebring found advertising highly profitable. They are today sound supporters of their home town paper.

The policy of the American has been to render the maximum of service, not only in making itself a good newspaper, but in promoting the development of the community. The American claims "A Subscriber in Every Home in Sebring," and intensive circulation in adjacent territory, all built up on reader interest.

The American averages 12 pages daily, and goes heavily into telegraph and feature material.

Growing With the Celery Crop in Sanford

THE Sanford Herald, with R. H. Berg as editor and manager, is one of the striking examples of journalistic achievement in the state. Sanford has much more than tripled its population since 1920. It is in the heart of one of the richest agricultural sections of the state, producing more than 20 per cent of the celery consumed in the United States. Something like 6000 carloads of this delectable vegetable is this season's Sanford crop. The crop value is between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000. Two years ago the Sanford Herald was a four-page, seven-column daily. It now averages 16 pages and eight columns in width. Its new plant, modern in every detail cost $150,000.

The Herald has a progressive editorial policy. At the top of its editorial column it publishes its platform, calling for improved transportation facilities, local improvements, beautification of the city, school expansion and general progress. The paper is replete with telegraph and local news and metropolitan features.

In addition to heavy run of real estate advertising the paper carries a substantial volume of commercial copy.

Strong Farm News and Editorials in Ocala Times

THE Central Florida Times is published at Ocala in Marion County, the most diversified, from the standpoint of crops, of any county in Florida. It was the first morning paper to be published in the city of 8,000 and started with a circulation of about 4,000 copies.

With sixteen pages six days per week and not less than 32 pages on Sunday the paper is growing steadily in advertising and circulation.

The Times goes in for comics, an excellent agricultural page and a strong editorial page. It is a newsy sheet. It has earnestly advocated cattle-tick eradication necessary to proper development of the dairy industry. It has refused to accept advertisements of real estate development companies not endorsed by Chambers of Commerce. One of its editorial policies has been to demand that all persons selling lands to persons outside of the state for agricultural purposes do so by means of plain statements of truth concerning those lands. The paper is independent in politics.

Key West Sees Bright Future When Auto Road Is Completed

MEASURING THE GROWTH OF CITIES

There are many ways of measuring the growth of cities but Miami and the Palm Beaches give a new one.

For instance The Palm Beach Times, published afternoons and Sunday mornings, was established September 8, 1922, and now has a paid circulation in excess of 11,000 copies daily.

The Miami Tribune, established March 11, 1924, published week day afternoons now has a paid circulation in excess of 20,000 copies and gaining at the rate of better than 2,000 monthly.

REALTY CROOKS MEETING SOLID OPPOSITION

Florida had the goods. She advertised. A great asset of interest and good will was created. People came, told their friends, and those friends came.

Then came the faker.

We in Florida are often utterly astonished at the number of chumps in the country—the number of people who apparently need guardians. From utter strangers they buy real estate which they have never seen, without even asking common sense questions about it.

Yet reliable information is available. Even the smallest cities in the state have Chambers of Commerce, and, because they are usually supported by public taxation, these chambers are, to all practical effects, branches of government. And nearly every community of any size has its Realty Board, whose members are pledged to the same high standards of ethics as realtors everywhere.

In addition, the State Chamber of Commerce, at Jacksonville, advertises widely its desire to be of service.

In spite of all of this, those who fatten on the chumps continue to be well-fed, and land and lots are sold to Northern easy marks which would not bring a tenth or a twentieth of the price in Florida, or could not be sold at any price.

There is plenty of speculation in Florida, in the sense that no man can know how fast the people will come—how soon a given population and consequent production of wealth will be attained. But, so far as Floridians are concerned, they are on the ground. They are studying conditions. They are using their heads.

The same thing applies, of course, to the outsider who, seeking a Florida investment, looks before he leaps.

But the sucker in the North does not speculate. For the most part he does not even have a chance to win.

As a matter of general policy, almost every Chamber of Commerce in Florida suggests that the buyer see what he is buying before he acts. There are, to be sure, many firms of such good repute that this is not always necessary. But it is good advice in most cases.

We have in Florida two important instruments for the protection of the public. One is the real estate licensing law, the operation of which is just getting headway under the direction of its father, Walter W. Rose of Orlando. The other is a recently organized Better Business Bureau section of the Florida State Chamber of Commerce of Jacksonville, which co-operates, of course, with the two present Better Business Bureaus in the state, at Miami and St. Petersburg.

And be it said to the credit of the newspapers of Florida that they have stood squarely behind these constructive movements, not only by giving their work editorial support, but with their money as well.

Florida, appreciating what her popularity has cost in dollars and cents and in effort, is on the job. She is doing all she can to protect her good name.

I have seen many industries respond whole-heartedly to the suggestion that they combine to protect their good name. But I never saw one respond more quickly and with better spirit and vigor than Florida is responding today.

FLORIDA ALERT TO CHECK PROMOTION FRAUDS

Better Business Bureaus on the Job to Weed Out Fakers and to Insist on Truth in Advertising—Ponzi Under Indictment—Other Promoters Forced to Return Money

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Feb. 23.—The State of Florida, through the activities of the Florida State Chamber of Commerce co-operating with the National Better Business Bureau, the Florida Association of Real Estate Boards, the Florida Real Estate Licensing Commission and local Chambers of Commerce, more than 200 of them, throughout Florida, is engaged in an aggressive campaign against fraudulent real estate promotions and misleading advertising of Florida property, with the result so far of putting numerous crooked promoters out of business, obtaining in several instances a return to the purchasers of money paid for misrepresented real estate and, what will be eventually the most valuable effect of all, the establishment of a censorship over Florida advertising in newspapers outside of the state.

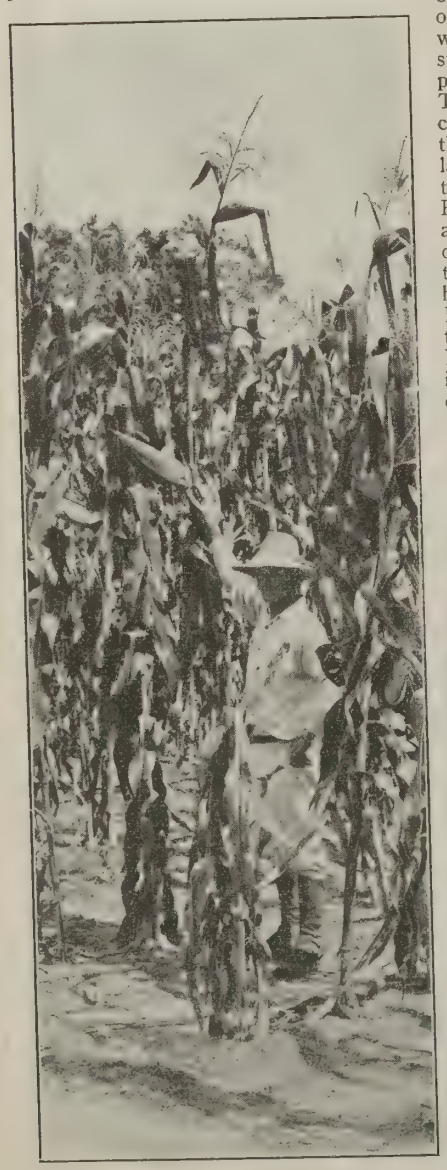
So far nobody has been put in jail as a result of this campaign, but indictments have been obtained against several promoters and post office fraud orders have been issued against others, engaged in attempting to take advantage of the widespread interest in Florida real estate by offering property through misleading and deceptive advertising.

One of the latest to be caught in the Better Business Bureau net is the notorious Charles Ponzi of Boston. After remaining out of the public eye for a considerable period following his conviction for swindling by means of international postal money orders, Ponzi popped up in Florida a few months ago with a scheme for selling units of indebtedness of a land company for which he was trustee. He offered these units for sale at $10 each with a guarantee—Ponzi has always been strong on guarantees—of 300 per cent profit to every purchaser after 30 days. The documents delivered to buyers were cleverly worded to permit the payment of the so-called profits in either money or land, the land being "lots" in a 100-acre tract of wild land in Columbia County, Florida, which Ponzi had bought for $16 an acre and on which no improvements of any kind beyond a few stakes to mark the limits of the 25x50 foot "lots" had been made. The Boston Better Business Bureau began the investigation and caused the arrest of Calcedoni Alviti, Ponzi's Boston partner, who had sold an incredible number of the Ponzi units to the same class of suckers who had fallen for Ponzi's earlier scheme. The Boston bureau referred the matter to the St. Petersburg, Fla., Better Business Bureau, the first one organized in the state, and it in turn took the matter up with the State Chamber of Commerce. The results to date are that Ponzi is under indictment on four counts for violations of the laws of Florida, his partner Alviti has been sentenced to six months in the House of Correction in Boston and is out under $5,000 bail pending an appeal, and Ponzi himself is endeavoring to persuade the Florida Better Business Bureau associates to consent to the withdrawal of their charges on his promise to make restitution. But the Federal authorities are on Ponzi's trail, and the attention of the Massachusetts authorities has been directed to these new activities.

"The newspapers of the United States are co-operating splendidly with the Florida State Chamber of Commerce and the Better Business Bureau in checking up on suspicious advertising and refusing to run advertisements which are not approved by one or both of these organizations," said John Garver of the National Better Business Bureau staff, who is in charge of investigations in Florida. "In Detroit all of the newspapers submit every Florida advertisement to the Better Business Bureau before accepting it. In many other Florida cities most or all of the newspapers refer all advertisements of Florida real estate to the Florida State Chamber of Commerce. In this way not only are crooked promoters who are already under investigation or suspicion prevented from spreading their nets for the unwary, but in some instances the first knowledge we have of new and suspicious promotions has come to us from the northern press.

"Two things I want to make particularly clear, in justice to the overwhelming majority of honest and worthy Florida real estate developers.

"One is that most of the crooked promotions not only do not originate in Florida, but are not operated in or from Florida. Of the thirty odd cases which the State Chamber of Commerce and Better Business Bureau now have under investigation more than two-thirds are operating exclusively in the north and have no representation of any kind in Florida.



"The second important point is that the total amount of land and of money involved in all of the cases of misrepresentation or fraud which we have been able to discover amounts to but a trifling fraction of the entire volume of real estate operations in Florida. I should say that the proportion was materially less than 1 per cent of the whole. That is enough, however, to create in the minds of the unthinking, and especially of those who have been stung and their friends, the impression that everything in Florida is on an equally untrustworthy basis.

"Even the acceptance by the northern public of the slogan 'Investigate before Investing' does not always serve to allay that suspicion. The State Chamber of Commerce, the Florida Association of Real Estate Boards and the Better Business Bureau have been using that slogan in their advertising for months and it is gaining effect. One of our investigators found that more than 500 'prospects' had made personal inspection of one so-called development which offered alluring profits to investors, but instead of congratulating themselves upon having acted upon our advice and looking further for investments of real merit, most of these had turned around and gone home loudly denouncing everything in Florida as fraudulent. It is human nature, apparently, to

VANDERBILT NEWSPAPERS, INC.

The development of Miami as a metropolis has created a market of unusual scope as the consumption of advertised and trade-marked merchandise testifies.

Miami is a city where permanent establishment and growth is positively assured and because of this fact National Advertisers should develop the market from the standpoint of output to their fullest ability.

The Illustrated Daily Tab (Morning and Sunday) has established itself as a live, clean newspaper worthy of consideration whenever advertising appropriations are being considered.

The Morning newspaper field presents an attractiveness both in potential worth and coverage which warrants the suggestion that the Illustrated Daily Tab be included in all national appropriations that include Miami.

generalize from insufficient information."

The First Better Business Bureau in Florida was organized just a year ago by the St. Petersburg Advertising Club, mainly through the efforts of William C. Freeman, the club's president, formerly one of the best known advertising men of New York City. Miami followed a short time later. At the August conference of Better Business Bureaus at Indianapolis it was decided to send a representative to Florida, in view of the many inquiries about Florida promotions which were being received by the 45 Better Business Bureaus throughout the United States. Edward A. Schwab, special representative of the National Better Business Bureau, who had been lent to the St. Petersburg bureau in the spring of 1925, was detailed to co-operate with Mr. Garver, who came to Florida early n November and has been continuously engaged in investigations since then. Fred Schwab and Ben Garver have since been added to the staff, and early in February the work of the Better Business Bureau and that of the State Chamber of Commerce along similar lines was co-ordinated.

"The Florida State Chamber of Commerce invited the Better Business Bureau to join forces with us in the effort to eliminate fraudulent promotions and misleading advertising from the Florida situation," said A. A. Coult, general secretary of the State Chamber. "The State Chamber of Commerce as such only came into existence in December, but for some months previously, as the Florida Development Board, we had been investigating, both with our own personnel and with the aid of investigators borrowed from the National Better Business Bureau, every suspicious promotion and advertisement that came to our notice. The present arrangement avoids duplication of effort and makes the work in this direction of the State Chamber, the State Association of Real Estate Boards and the Better Business Bureau more effective.

"Since Feb. 1 the work has been so organized that we can now not only read every Florida real estate advertisement which is published and check up promptly on representations made, through the local Chambers of Commerce and Real Estate Boards affiliated and co-operating with us, but we can inspect the property offered, look up the people back of it, and be prepared to give intelligent information about particular developments and to curb the activities of those who through over-enthusiasm, lack of experience or deliberate intent misrepresent the properties which they offer.

"Original investigations of this kind put the State Chamber of Commerce in a position to answer the enormous correspondence resulting from our advertisements in northern newspapers and magazines. Each of these advertisements carries a coupon to be sent in by those desiring information about Florida. Many want merely general information such as can be given through booklets and other printed matter, but a surprisingly high percentage of inquiries relate to specific developments and real estate offerings.

"In all something like 200 investigations have been made. In only a few has anything that could properly be termed a fraud been discovered. In some instances it has been found that the owners were entirely honest but that they were unaware of the representations made by the men in charge of sales and advertising. For example, a development known as Kissimmee Shores was represented as suitable for immediate agricultural occupation, as being near the City of Kissimmee on a main state highway and with ample railroad facilities. Kenneth Backman, manager of the Boston Better Business Bureau, called the attention of the State Chamber of Commerce to the advertising of this project which was appearing in New England. Our investigation disclosed the fact that the property lies 50 miles from Kissimmee, that it is not on a main highway nor a railroad, and that it will require a great deal of drainage before it can be farmed. I communicated these facts to the Boston Bet-

but the state has not learned to refine it for fertilizer in her own plants. The total mineral output is valued at $16,000,000 per annum. There is a large fishing industry and a lively tobacco manufacturing business, particularly of cigars, of which half a billion are produced in a year. The forest yield is more than $40,000,000, including turpentine and rosin. There are diversified small industries, outside of agriculture, but all are dwarfed by the building, tourist trade, commercial retailing, transportation and agriculture.

Now that the excitement of the big speculative land rush has subsided the thoughtful citizen discusses the future of the new-found state, and the great, pulsating, unanimous thought is—agriculture. If the state has been neglected as a resort it has been wholly ignored as a seat of immense farming enterprise. Less than ten per cent of the available and suitable farm land, some of it as black as your hat and much of it of amazing fertility, has been touched by plough or harrow. Indeed, 20,000,000 acres, susceptible of cultivation for from one to four annual crops of some 250 logical commodities, lie under the sun in their primitive state.

This is another paradox, for Florida eats and demands the best and her natural crops come at a time of the year when they may sell in northern markets as luxuries. The state does not by any means feed its own population. L. M. Rhodes, of the Florida State Marketing Bureau, recently prepared the following record of the 1925 food importations into Florida from the outside world:

Bacon and pork	$19,403,221
Beef and veal	13,797,106
Dairy products	24,035,181
Lard	3,199,668
Lamb and mutton	1,700,000
Poultry	7,500,000
Eggs	4,500,000
Flour, meal, bread	18,000,000
Corn	8,000,000
Feed stuffs	5,250,000
Canned goods, fruits and vegetables	18,750,000
Total	$124,135,176

It will be understood, of course, the state has no census machinery for securing direct absolutely accurate data, but it is possible to reach certain estimates by deduction, and this Mr. Rhodes did.

Mr. Rhodes' estimates point the way to the farmer of the future, an accurate indication of what is needed. And Horace E. Norton, one of the best-informed and most conservative agricultural analysts of the state, with national experience, said to this writer:

"Every item on the import list can be grown in Florida, some better here than in any place that I have ever discovered. It is one of the great economic absurdities that Florida last year purchased outside of her borders a quarter of a million dollars worth of foodstuffs.

"This is an excellent cattle and hog country. The tick that plagues cattle can be controlled and is being controlled. I have never seen finer hogs in any state than here. The state needs dairy development on a large scale. Around Jacksonville is the best chicken country I know of, and one young friend of mine has made a clean-up there with poultry in the past two years. You see wild ducks on every lake, but you will hunt far and wide for a duck farm like those which abound on Long Island. There are four or five excellent varieties of hay which may be grown the year round in Florida. We can grow alfalfa, but there are more profitable hays. We can grow oats and corn in immense quantities. Florida has been simply neglected.

The future will see a great number of small farms here. Ten acres is enough for a man, if he farms intensively. I know a man who makes $7,000 a year from two acres. Intelligent farming will net large scale farming from $200 to a $1,000 an acre. This is the next big move in Florida."

The land along the northern boundary of the state is looked upon as the best general farming country. The best citrus fruit land lies down the peninsula, from 50 to 75 miles below the northern border.

Florida is sandy around her boundaries, white sand at the coast lines and sometimes in the interior, rich sandy loan on the big central ridge or terrace that extends from the northern border south almost to the Everglades. Geologists say that Florida was once under water and as the seas have receded through the long spans of time terraces have been left on either side of the peninsula, the center being 280 to 300 feet above sea level and the coast terraces being so flat that the ebb tides leave millions of acres of marsh land exposed.

There are, of course, exceptional wide beaches of hard sand, where automobiles race for thirty miles.

Florida's 50,000 farmers, occupying 2,000,000 acres, raise annual crops approaching $100,000,000 in value. Fruits, berries (including magnificent strawberries and blueberries), sugar cane, tobacco, ferns, celery and potatoes, and all manner of garden truck, melons, nuts ranging from the coconut to the delicious paper-

Many look to the Everglades as the future garden spot of the state, able to feed a large section of the world's population. This vast saucer, covering 4,500 square miles, lying south of Lake Okeechobee, with its black muck bed created by centuries of layers of decayed vegetation, is being reclaimed by the tractor which ploughs drainage canals 20 to 75 feet wide, relieving the land of its water and making seed grow under the hot sun with stupendous results. The farmer is now at work in the Everglades. Among his crops are all sorts of garden truck, sugar cane, rice, hay, corn, millet, maize, peanuts, oranges, grapefruit, limes, avocados and bananas. He is also raising live stock in small volume. The Everglades are being sold as small farms, but many believe that the future will see vast ranch operations carried on there by corporations which will specialize farming on a new scale. One of the familiar remarks is that the Everglades will some day make fruit and vegetable luxuries as common in the North in December as they are in September.

In his excellent book, "Florida in the Making," Frank Parker Stockbridge

"Florida's Fastest Growing Newspaper"

The big tabloid success of the past year in America. It is a true newspaper, done up in the convenient package of the new journalism. It is a leader of thought and action in wonderful Tampa, independent, liberal, constructive, wholesome, a paper for home-loving, state-building men and women.

Because the Globe is a good newspaper, a delightful entertainment, an independent advocate of progress, Tampa has given it splendid support from its first issue. In less than a year it has become a notable circulation and advertising success.

National distributors of worthy merchandise deserve to know that the gateway to Tampa's substantial homes is the

After one has visited many of the 38 es of the state where daily newspapers published the temptation is to write ook-length account of their individual racter, almost uniform beauty and onishing common development during to two years. A dozen of them almost brand new.

acksonville is the solid northern base Florida's progress, itself last to fall ler the spell of speculative rushing today as live and with as many insting stories to tell as any other city. builders are there, making over the city, much of which deserves to reon because of ancient glory.

No more romantic city exists in Amerthan St. Augustine, first white man element in the United States, to which g relics of the five governments under ch she has lived. But St. Augustine, ite her narrow twisting streets, is ntially a modern city, filled with nificent hotels and homes, gay and ring. On the road to Orlando, ropolis of the center of the state, one the bustling, clean new cities of tings, Palatka, DeLand, Sanford and rs, and the rich truck gardens with usion of lettuce, celery, beans, cubers, peppers, strawberries, and es. Ferns are grown here in the -shade of lattice buildings; florists the whole country use them to garbouquets.

Orlando had in 1910 3,894 people, and Carl Hunt told this writer that the present population is 31,478. The value of her city property has multiplied 27 times. Her total bank resources are $26,000,000. A progressive, liberal town is Orlando and beautiful to look upon.

Kissimmee, Haines City, Winter Haven, Lakeland, Plant City, Bartow, Sebring, Arcadia, Punta Gorda are on the long, good road to Fort Myer, all deserving a place in the picture of a state being magically built. Each has its industries, each its chamber of commerce, each its devoted advocates, each its quota of fine homes, parks, drives, trading centers and most often a municipal band. Fort Myers is spotless and possesses one of the prettiest residential streets in the country.

North on the Gulf coast the road leads through Sarasota and Bradenton to Tampa, famous old city, now triple its 1920 size, modernized, impressive, as active as any northern town, and very rich. Over Gandy Bridge, more than six miles in length, one-half of the distance over water, you wheel your way, en route paying a toll which seems to be fair, but which, you are told, is regarded by the bridge corporation to be so excessive that application has been made to the legislature to have it cut down in the public interest. By this bridge the distance to St. Petersburg is shortened by 40 miles and time is money in Florida. St. Petersburg was named by a sailor from Russia as a result of a little discussion on the primitive dock of the long ago between that gentleman and a crony from Detroit. The latter was loyal to the Michigan city and the two drew lots, St. Petersburg winning. The defeated gentleman later started the Detroit Hotel, now a romantic hostelry of the city. The old fishing village of a quarter of a century ago today has more than 50,000 residents and some of the claims of Winter population run as high as 150,000. It is a resort city, with wide streets, glorious drives, fine hotels is certainly a position that shows both vision and courage, and I did not hesitate to say to the business men of Florida that I knew that honest business men in every part of the country would strike hands with them in helping them maintain that position.

But before I close this article I must not forget to say a word about the greatest book on Florida that has yet seen the light. Of course I refer to "Florida in the Making," by Frank Parker Stockbridge and John Holliday Perry, two newspaper men known in every part of the country. They have really put on the printed page a moving panorama of what is going on in this great State all the way from Key West to Pensacola. After reading a chapter or two one gets into the swing of this mighty moving picture and has that sense of reality that one gets in trudging the great highways of India with "Kim." As a newspaper man myself, I lift my hat in admiration to what two co-workers in the newspaper field have done—they have made a book that presents to the life the varied resources of a wonderful state and the type and character of the men who are developing them.

They talk about Miami as being a 100,000 population city and although this writer did not stop to count he believes it. It is a city of business, with good times on the side, and men have made fortunes there that should furnish "success stories" for magazines that like 'em for years and years. Everyone seemed to be working at New York speed in Miami last week, and the newspaper fellows said this kept up the year through.

EDITORIAL

And now there is another big hotel about to open — the Rolyat in Pasadena. Have you seen this wonderful place? It is truly Spanish in design and construction and atmosphere. Wonderful, wonderful conception. It has a touch of Castilian Castle, the homey likeness of a Hacienda of the Spanish Dons. When one gets in the midst of this magnificent pile and realizes that the tile vases and much of the trimming was brought from Mexico and Spain he lends himself to dreams. We know no place like the Rolyat, but for some reason or other it reminds us of Mission Inn, Riverside, California. There seems to be an awe-inspiring something that breathes an atmosphere altogether different from anything else we have. Go out and see the Rolyat. It is worth your while to know that this wonderful work of art, a monument to Jack Taylor, is one of St. Petersburg's greatest assets.

How about the railroad crossings that the city commissioners were going to give the railroads 10 days to protect? What has happened. Whose fault is it that these crossings are not protected? We know that Mayor Blanc wants them protected because he said so, and Mayor Blanc is as much interested in the interests of the people and protecting the people as anybody can be. He is a man with a great big heart. He is a man who is full of sympathy, and we know that he wants to protect our people from accidents at the railroad crossings.

Now, isn't there something that can be done to put the road act into effect that was passed some days ago asking that these railroad crossings be protected? Why is it that the city has to ask the railroad to do this? Why not order them to do it? Why not tell them that if they don't do it they can't run their trains across the street? Then they will do it. What right has the railroad company, because it is a railroad company and has a franchise, to go to certain points and endanger the lives of our citizens? Why? It seems to us that the mayor should issue an order to the chief of police to arrest the engineer, fireman and conductor of a train crossing the street and put them in jail. It is done in other cities. Why down in Miami the railroad paid no attention to the congested district of the city, and it happens that the main line of this road coming into Miami crosses Flagler street within 50 feet of the main fire station. On one occasion a railroad train stopped the passage of a fire engine across the tracks and serious damage and almost a fatal result was the price.

Now if this railroad blocks the street, Chief of Police Quigg, of Miami, will arrest the fireman, the conductor and the engineer and lock them up. And, you bet, he soon put a stop to blocking Flagler street in Miami. Why can't the mayor here issue an order to the chief of police to put one or two train crews in jail? Of course the engineer and brakeman will say that they get their orders from the division superintendent, the vice president, the president and the dispatcher but we will soon find out who is the boss and, by cracky, if we cannot rule our own city we don't see why we let the railroad do it.

Look it up, Mayor Blanc, and see if you can't start something. Give them a poke in the locomotive.

Probably one of the most masterly speeches and addresses to a court of justice was made by J. F. Bickers in the case of the state against Gilooly Monday in Judge Bird's court in Clearwater—a concise, clean, clear-cut speech in defense of Gilooly's contention that there was no law on the statute books of this commonwealth against the operation of moving pictures on Sunday nights. Attorney Bickers has achieved a victory which is state-wide. His victory was founded on the decisions of the supreme court of Florida, on the decisions of the supreme court of Tennessee, and on the decisions of the supreme court of other states in which Sunday is defined as being from sunrise to sunset. This is an old law. It was the law of the English code. As the decision of Judge Bird now stands, moving pictures may operate after 6 p. m. or after sunset Sunday and during Sunday night. The passage of an ordinance by the city of St. Petersburg will have no result in the stoppage of this law, as an ordinance must be passed on the law and the term of the ordinance will amount to nothing in the enforcement of a city rule that has been already determinted by a state court.

UNCLE FRANK.

Ten months old, and the leading newspaper in its territory! That's the record of the DAILY NEWS, St. Petersburg's Picture Paper.

Building permits for 1925 in the Sunshine City went over $20,000,000. Bank deposits increased $15,000,000 over 1924. Winter population will beat 150,000.

That's a market!

And it is covered by the DAILY NEWS. Circulation has risen from zero last March, to 20,000 now. The Sunday News, started in September with a 144-page paper, hit 10,000 on street sales alone on January 3, giving it a total of over 20,000. The Daliy News will pay $3,000 to any charitable organization that any newspaper may nominate, if the Daily News cannot show a larger paid circulation than any other newspaper in Pinellas County. Put the DAILY NEWS FIRST on lists covering this large, growing and perpetually prosperous market.

faces are known through half-tones all the way around the world. Magnificent Coral Gables lies just to the south, playground of those who "love nice things," to borrow a popular advertising slogan.

North through Fort Lauderdale, "watch her grow," Delray, Lake Worth, West Palm Beach, Hollywood, Fort Pierce each a city rising and expanding under the spell of the rush, amid the charms of the Indian River coastline, to Daytona the visitor speeds along usually well paved roads which follow the curving waterline.

In a dash around the state this writer missed visiting both the southern keys that lead to Key West over the Flagler-built railroad, which to all intents and purposes makes a steel locomotive and coaches "put to sea," and also the great panhandle of the state, on the north, from Jacksonville to Pensacola.

After one is through with the first ravings about the joys of the east and west coasts and has stopped blinking at the immensity of the Everglades, he begins to learn that the north section of Florida is, for very practical reasons, considered among her choicest possessions.

This is hill country. Along the coast it is sandy. But running through its center is a ridge of extremely fertile land. Agricultural experts say that this is the "best general farming land in Florida" and will some day be the seat of farming operations which will surprise the world. It is the old settled section of the state, but it has felt the new awakening and in the larger cities there is now in progress, this writer was reliably informed, a notable building boom. In this district the Southern plantation survives, the planters raising cotton, corn, tobacco, potatoes and satsuma oranges. Pensacola is one of the romantic cities of the state, picturesque, alluring, an excellent business town. It has been discovered by the tourist during the past two years and whereas, a few years ago, Pensacola was dreaming on its gorgeous bay, it is today hustling to entertain a great influx of visitors.

In the panhandle district of Florida millions of acres of rich land lie untouched by the hand of man. Acreage values have increased but are still within the grasp of the average farmer. Tallahassee, famed capital of the state, is located in the center of the panhandle, the seat of many magnificent estates and the trading center of the plantation countryside. Other good towns in the district are Quincy, Perry and Mayo.

"Bring this land under intelligent cultivation and we will supply the food requirements of ten million human beings," say the advocates of northern Florida, who add that the Apalachicola oyster, which yields itself in liberal quantity from many coast beds, is the "finest known south of the Virginia capes."

The annual report of the Florida State Marketing Bureau for the fiscal year ending July 30, 1925, gave the following statistics concerning shipments of perishable crops in that period:

	Carloads
Oranges	26,209
Grapefruit	20,814
Mixed Citrus	4,442
Tangerines	1,789
Pineapples	318
Peaches	4
Strawberries	883
Cantaloupes	9
Watermelons	6,668
Celery	8,143
Tomatoes	7,634
Potatoes, Irish	5,054
Cucumbers	2,087
Beans	2,197
Cabbage	1,898
Lettuce	1,561
Peppers	1,209
Mixed Vegetables	3,206
Total	94,125

Two or three sugar mills have been set up in the Everglades, but as Florida has not been notable for her manufacturing enterprise, most of the sugar cane is shipped elsewhere for refining.

Peanut growing is on a large scale.

Henry Ford and Harvey Firestone's experiments, in the Everglades, with the pruning of rubber trees has greatly excited the state. They have 20,000 acres set apart for this venture which, if successful, may make impossible future European squeezes of the American automobilist. The "millions-in-it" gentry have had soft picking with the future rubber greatness of the state, but this in truth is on the lap of the gods.

William J. Connor's work in the Everglades is monumental. He has acquired a stupendous acreage and his wood-building is a marvel for all those who come to see. Barron G. Collier, car-card advertising magnate, is perhaps the biggest individual acreage owner in Florida—perhaps 900,000 acres in the South, vast tracts of which are in the state of their primitive wildness. Wild game abounds there.

This snap-shot of Florida in February, 1926, may be wholly inadequate, but perhaps it will be sufficient to dispel the puerile world-wide notion, doubtless originating in old-time grammar geographies, that the big toe of Uncle Sam's left foot is overrun by jungle snakes and alligators. Of the former this writer saw none and the latter have all been penned to furnish leather for the neat purses one sees in the novelty shops.

The BACKBONE of FLORIDA

AGRICULTURE is the backbone of Florida.

While our climate is ideal for pleasure-seekers, it also makes possible the growth of the world's best citrus fruits, winter vegetables and most of the other known products of the soil.

The development of Florida cities and urban property values may be influenced by incoming tourists, but the market for the products of Florida farms is nation-wide and ever increasing.

There is room for more farmers in Florida and it is comparatively easy for real workers to become home-owners. Real estate men of vision are making small farm ownership possible to new thousands—and the vast majority of these new farmers are succeeding.

"But People Have to Get Their Sunpapers"

¶ The history of Sun Carrier Service records many instances of delivery of the Sunpapers under most trying difficulties. Add this as the latest:

¶ On Sunday morning, Feb. 14, when Daniel Lancaster, a Sun Carrier, was stricken with bronchial pneumonia as he served his Sunpapers, Mrs. Emily Lancaster, his wife, completed the delivery, and for several days thereafter substituted for her husband besides nursing him, keeping house and caring for four children.

¶ When Mrs. Lancaster was asked how she managed it she replied: "It's hard work. But people have to get their Sunpapers."

Staff Nelson Trained May Purchase Star In Trustees' Sale Under Will

Death of Mrs. Kirkwood, Daughter of Kansas City Daily's Founder, Makes Sale Mandatory to Establish Art Collection—Three Local Business Men Named as Trustees

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

KANSAS CITY, Mo., March 3.—The Kansas City Star, founded in 1880 by William Rockhill Nelson, passes today, along with all other properties of the Nelson estate, into the hands of three trustees.

Instructions of Mr. Nelson's will are that the Star shall be sold by the trustees at the earliest practical time—not later than two years—the proceeds to be added to the Nelson Estate Fund, a perpetual foundation for the purchase of art works and reproductions as a collection for Kansas City.

It is understood that the present personnel organization, headed by Irwin Kirkwood, is a prospective purchaser.

The organization, which will enter the field as a prospective purchaser, will be built around the men active in the management, who are: Irwin Kirkwood, editor; A. F. Seested, general manager; R. E. Stout, managing editor; George B. Longan, assistant managing editor; H. J. Haskell, associate editor, and J. T. Barrons, advertising manager.

All of these men, who have been with the Star more than 25 years, were trained by W. R. Nelson from their youth. George B. Longan is acting managing editor. Mr. Stout, the managing editor, has been in the Philippines since December. He is expected home in April.

Mr. Kirkwood's fortune, augmented by Mrs. Kirkwood's estate, is estimated at approximately $4,000,000. Mrs. Nelson, deceased in 1921, and Mrs. Laura Nelson Kirkwood, his daughter, who died last Saturday in Baltimore, were trustees of the estate for life and received all the income.

Mr. Nelson, who died in 1915, provided in his will that at the death of his wife and daughter, a board of three trustees for his estate should be appointed by the presidents of the state universities of Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma, with vacancies on the board of trustees in years to come to be filled by appointment from whomsoever then are presidents of those universities.

Dr. Stratton B. Brooks of Missouri, Dr. E. H. Lindley of Kansas and Dr. William B. Bizzell of Oklahoma, the present university presidents, met here Monday and conferred three days in making their selections. Final choice fell on J. C. Nichols and Herbert V. Jones, realtors, and William Volker, manufacturer, all of Kansas City. Nichols is a nationally known city planner and consultant, the builder of this city's Country Club district. Jones is a leading industrial property realtor. Volker is the city's outstanding philanthropist, giving away a fortune every year in a wide variety of charities and aids.

That the university presidents were particularly interested in conserving the ideals and standards of the Star as the outstanding parcel of the Nelson estate was indicated in this statement issued by them following the appointment of the trustees:

"We have sought in our deliberations to protect the standards and ideals of a great newspaper (the Star) and at the same time provide for the fulfillment of Mr. Nelson's objective, to found a wonderful art center. We want to make plain our concern for the protection of the standards of the great newspaper Mr. Nelson founded."

The late Mrs. Laura Nelson Kirkwood

The newly appointed trustees have not indicated what methods they will follow in converting the Star into cash, nor when they will begin the collection of art works as directed by Mr. Nelson's will.

However, it is believed they will endeavor to find purchasers who will continue it along the policies under which it has operated, the three trustees having fought shoulder to shoulder with the Star in all city benefit campaigns.

While the Star is the greatest asset of the Nelson estate, there are many other properties that will bring the ultimate total up to around $10,000,000, according to general estimates.

There are holdings at the northeast corner of 11th street and Grand avenue, the old home of the Star, held by the estate under a 99-year lease; a paper mill site in the East Bottoms; the addition known as Rockhill, a subdivision of residence property upon which are some seventy houses owned by the estate and more than one hundred acres of vacant property; and the "Sni-a-Bar" farms, consisting of 1,750 acres, at Grain Valley in the eastern party of Jackson County. The latter are to be continued as a demonstration farm under the will for nineteen years longer, the entire period having been thirty years after Mr. Nelson's death. In addition, there are the Star Building and its site and the 150 feet of vacant property immediately to the south at the northeast corner of 18th street and Grand avenue, running through to McGee street.

All of the income from this estate is solely for the purchase of art works and reproductions, Mrs. Nelson and Mrs. Kirkwood having left ample bequests for the purchase of a site and erection of a building suitable to house these art objects.

The estate of Mrs. Kirkwood, valued approximately at $2,000,000, is bequeathed to Irwin Kirkwood, her husband, for his lifetime. After Mr. Kirkwood's death the proceeds of the estate are to be expended upon the building to house the William R. Nelson Gallery of Art.

With Mrs. Kirkwood's death, the estate of Mrs. Ida H. Nelson, her mother, becomes available for the same purpose, the procurement of a site and a suitable building to be the home of the Gallery of Art. Mrs. Nelson left an estate of approximately $750,000 to be used for this purpose, the estate being Mrs. Kirkwood's, in trust during her lifetime.

In the will Mrs. Kirkwood named Mr. Kirkwood as executor, to serve without bond. The will provides after Mr. Kirkwood's death, Fred C. Vincent, John E. Wilson, attorney for the Star, and the New England National Bank & Trust Company shall be succeeding trustees.

Two specific funds were established by Mrs. Kirkwood, a fund of $60,000 for the maintenance of the Ida H. Nelson Choir Memorial at Grace and Holy Trinity Church and a fund of $105,000 for the maintenance of the Nelson Memorial Chapel in Mount Washington Cemetery.

Mrs. Kirkwood's estate is entrusted to Mr. Kirkwood to handle "as he may see fit" and to be invested or reinvested "in such manner as he may deem prudent."

Oak Hall, the family home, passes to Mr. Kirkwood, with the provision that it be razed at his death, or in the event it should be desired to dispose of the property. Oak Hall, not fireproof and built in units over an extended period, was not considered safe or desirable for a gallery of art. The provision for razing is a safeguard that the home built by Mr. Nelson might not fall into later disuse.

The will directs the sale of Mrs. Kirkwood's jewelry and personal effects, the proceeds to go into the trust estate left to Mr. Kirkwood.

A portrait of William Rockhill Nelson, hanging in Oak Hall, is to be placed in the William Rockhill Nelson Gallery.

A camp in the Adirondacks, near Paul Smith's Station, where Mrs. Kirkwood spent many summers, also is bequeathed to Mr. Kirkwood.

Mrs. Kirkwood was absorbed in four things:

FERGUSON NAMED NEA PRESIDENT SUCCEEDING EUGENE MacLEAN

United Press Vice-President Takes Syndicate Post After 18 Years with News Service—MacLean Goes to California

FRED FERGUSON, for five years vice-president and general news manager of the United Press Associations, was this week elected president and general manager of NEA Service, Inc., Cleveland, succeeding Eugene MacLean, resigned. Mr. Ferguson's successor on the U. P. has not yet been appointed.

By his election by the NEA board, Mr. Ferguson acquires considerable stock in the feature service corporation, and becomes a member of its directorate, of which Roy W. Howard is chairman. He left immediately for Cleveland and will divide his time between that city and the NEA New York office.

Mr. MacLean has returned to California, where he owns the Marysville (Cal.) Democrat, now under the management of F. W. McKechnie, his associate for a number of years. It is reported he intends to build up a string of small California dailies.

In addition to managing his newspaper properties, MacLean will syndicate original fiction for newspapers. He has developed the fiction service of NEA to a conspicuous place in the field. He personally supervised the writing of "The Flapper Wife," "Footloose," "Spinsterhood" and "The Yellow Stub," recent NEA releases, and in addition wrote "These Women," to be released by NEA this month, and which will appear in book form and in motion pictures later in the year.

Mr. Ferguson, who is 38 years old, has been with the U. P. for 18 years. He was one of a group of Indiana men asked to join the U. P. service by Mr. Howard when he was U. P. president. The two had grown up together as boys and Mr. Ferguson had succeeded Mr. Howard as high school correspondent for the Indianapolis News in the early days.

Joining the U. P. in 1908, Mr. Ferguson served as bureau manager in Pittsburgh, Indianapolis, and San Francisco, where he was Pacific Coast manager. He also served in Chicago, Washington, New York, London and Paris. His interests have always been centered in the editorial side of the news gathering organization.

During the war, Mr. Ferguson, then manager of the New York office, was sent abroad as the U. P. representative with the American Expeditionary Force. He was put in complete charge of the U. P. war correspondents, with four men under him at different times. While primarily reporting action on the American front, he also was sent at various times to the French, English and Italian sectors.

He scored many important beats for his press association, and for his pluck and daring gained wide popularity among American war writers. Once while riding to the front he was nearly killed in a motor lorry crash. He was thrown over the windshield to the road, when the racing lorry ran into another truck at a cross-road.

Mr. Ferguson's outstanding war story was that describing the St. Mihiel advance. Careful preliminary preparations enabled him to get his story to this country four hours ahead of his rivals. The night before the battle the operations staff called in the correspondents and explained the plan of attack. Zero hour was to be six o'clock, with different objectives scheduled to be taken at seven, eight, and nine throughout the morning. Ferguson wrote two bulletins for each hour, one that the objective had been taken, the other that it had not. These he left with an officer in the intelligence department, with instructions to send out the correct bulletins as reports came back from the front by telephone. Then Ferguson with the other correspondent went up to the battle lines. When they came back, his story had reached the United States, and he was able to complete a general lead, which beat all others to this side.

A pre-arranged signaling scheme also aided Ferguson in scoring a beat on the signing of the peace treaty at Versailles. He had had a direct telephone wire cut in to an adjoining room, and a wave of his arm when the first German signed sent the news speeding to America.

NEW TABLOID CITY EDITOR

E. J. McHugh Takes Over Desk on New York Daily News

E. J. McHugh has been appointed city editor of the New York Daily News, succeeding Jack Masters, who remains with the News organization in another capacity.

E. J. McHUGH

McHugh was formerly picture editor. He has been with the News for six years. Prior to that he was publicity director for army recruiting in Pennsylvania and publicity advisor to Billy Sunday.

He started newspaper work on the Scranton (Pa.) Republican, while attending St. Thomas College in Scranton. He also worked for the Wilkes-Barre Times-Leader and the Wilkes-Barre Independent.

On the News he has held down every job in the editorial department up to his present position, including reporter, in the slot, on the rim, make-up, and utility man in the sporting department.

U. S. DAILY "FOUNDERS" ANNOUNCED

No Office-Holders on List of 50 Distinguished Republicans and Democrats—Paper Started March 4

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4.—Names of the men and women associated with him as founders of the United States Daily, the new national newspaper which appeared today, were made public by David Lawrence, president and editor of the publication. The founders are fifty in number, equally divided between Republicans and Democrats, and they represent virtually every state and section of the country.

The masthead of the new paper carries this statement: "The sole purpose of the United States Daily is to present a complete and comprehensive record of the daily activities of the government of the United States in all its branches—legislative, executive and judicial—without editorial opinion or comment of any kind. Believing that such a daily newspaper will fill a distinct place in the life of the American people, the following men and women founded this publication:"

Owen D. Young, chairman of the boards of the General Electric Company and Radio Corporation of America.

Mrs. Medill McCormick, member of the Republican National Committee.

Otto H. Kahn, member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

Edward W. Bok, formerly editor, Ladies' Home Journal.

Robert Lansing, Secretary of State from 1915 to 1920.

Jesse H. Jones, treasurer, Democratic National Committee.

Albert D. Lasker, chairman of the United States Shipping Board from 1921 to 1923.

John W. Weeks, Secretary of War from 1921 to 1925.

Walter C. Teagle, president, Standard Oil Company of New Jersey.

Miss Belle Sherwin, president, National League of Women Voters.

Willard Saulsbury, U. S. Senator from Delaware, 1913-1919.

E. A. Deeds, president, Dayton Engineering Laboratories Company.

Philip H. Gadsden, vice-president, United Gas Improvement Company, Philadelphia.

Simon Guggenheim, president, American Smelting & Refining Company.

Mrs. Charles H. Sabin, Republican National Committee.

Bernard M. Baruch, chairman of War Industries Board, 1918-1919.

George F. Porter, chairman, Convention Committee, Progressive National Committee.

Breckenridge Long, Third Assistant Secretary of State, 1917-1920.

F. Trubee Davison, member of the New York State Senate.

James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany.

Elmer Schlesinger, vice-president and general counsel, United States Shipping Board, 1921-1922.

Mrs. Norman de R. Whitehouse, American Delegate to Switzerland, 1918.

B. F. Yoakum, railroad executive and agriculturist.

E. T. Meredith, Secretary of Agriculture, 1920-1921.

Julius Rosenwald, chairman of Board, Sears, Roebuck & Co.

Mary Roberts Rinehart, author.

C. Bascom Slemp, private secretary to President Coolidge, 1923-1925.

H. P. Wilson, president, Great Western Power Company.

Van H. Merle Smith, Third Assistant Secretary of State, 1920-1921.

Wayne Johnson, formerly Solicitor, Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Frank L. Polk, Under-Secretary of State, 1919-1920.

Miss Anne Morgan, chairman executive committee, American Commission for Devastated France.

Ira C. Copley, former Congressman from Illinois.

Joseph S. Frelinghuysen, former United States Senator from New Jersey.

Dr. Stanley M. Rinehart, formerly Medical Adviser, Tuberculosis Division, United States Veterans' Bureau.

James D. Phelan, former United States Senator from California.

Mrs. Elmer Schlesinger, author.

Col. E. M. House, Member of American Peace Commission.

Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, Democratic National Committee.

Robert H. Patchin, manager, W. R. Grace & Co.

Walter Fahy, member, Lyman Smith & Co., New York.

Clarence H. Mackay, president, Postal Telegraph Company.

John W. Davis, former American Ambassador to Great Britain.

John Barrett, formerly Director-General, Pan-American Union.

William B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, 1913-1921, and now special representative, United Mine Workers of America.

Robert S. Brookings, president, Institute of Economics.

William Ritter, chairman of Board, W. M Ritter Lumber Company.

Jay Jerome Williams, vice-president and publisher, the United States Daily.

Mrs. Leroy Springs, Democratic National Committee.

David Lawrence, president of the Consolidated Press Association.

While the list of founders includes many persons who have held high offices in the government in the past, it does not contain the name of a single federal official now in office. The non-partisan character of the paper, it was felt, would be the more apparent if no government official was a founder.

NIGHTSTICK CENSORSHIP IN PASSAIC STRIKE

Police Turn From Beating and Gassing Textile Mill Workers to Smashing Press Cameras, Beating Reporters and Destroying Notes—Papers to Sue City

POLICE of strike-ridden Passaic and Clifton, N. J., on March 3 closed their eyes to the Constitutional guarantees of freedom of the press and peaceful assembly and beat newspaper reporters and photographers with clubs in an evident attempt to suppress news of their brutality in handling a crowd of 2,000 textile strikers.

DOROTHY DAYTON

Cameras worth $5,000 were smashed. One newspaper woman was beaten and her notes torn to bits. Six newspaper men were clubbed and manhandled by the supposed upholders of the law. Others escaped with plates and notes only by hiding.

Those attacked, when questioned by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, declared there could be no other reason for the onslaught but that the police wished to suppress the news they were gathering by word and picture.

On the next day the New York Daily Mirror sent two armored cars to Passaic and Clifton to carry their cameramen and reporters. The New York Daily News sent one armored car with orders from Capt. J. M. Patterson, editor, to keep it away from the strike district unless the News staff men were again attacked by police.

Ruben Maury, reporter, and James Finnegan, cameraman, manned the News' little car. Martin McEvilly, camera man of the News, was sent aloft in an airplane to fly over the strike district.

One of the Mirror's steel-cased cars was rammed by a heavy truck and pitched down a 10-foot embankment early Thursday afternoon, and four camera men were injured.

"The truck was one of the heavy type used by the textile mills," Philip Payne, the Mirror managing editor, said.

The injured, all of whom were treated at a Paterson, N. J., hospital were:

A. Auerbach, Walter Ranzini, and Thomas Darling, of the Mirror, and John Brockhurst, of International Newsreel.

The truck sped away without stopping.

When the Mirror cars first arrived near Passaic, traffic police attempted to hold them up, charging a traffic regulation was violated, because they carried signs which obscured the rear windows, obstructing the view. Drivers pointed out the cars were equipped with mirrors on the front fenders, enabling them to see behind them. Police then permitted them to proceed.

"We'll get you yet," police yelled after them.

Legal departments of both tabloids were asked by their respective managing editors, Philip A. Payne, Mirror, and Frank Hause, News, to proceed to protect the newspapers' rights and bring suit against the city of Passaic for damages to cameras and injuries that were sustained by staff men.

Sale of both tabloids in Clifton and Passaic was banned by police order, but circulation men on both newspapers said they were able to sell more than the usual number of copies.

Dorothy Dayton of the New York Sun, clubbed by Police on Wednesday, told EDITOR & PUBLISHER Thursday, it was certainly not accidental.

"Whether it was on orders from headquarters or not, there is no doubt that the police were trying to suppress the news we were collecting," she said.

"We learned they were mad because of some pictures published in the New York Mirror early last month. These pictures showed the police clubbing women.

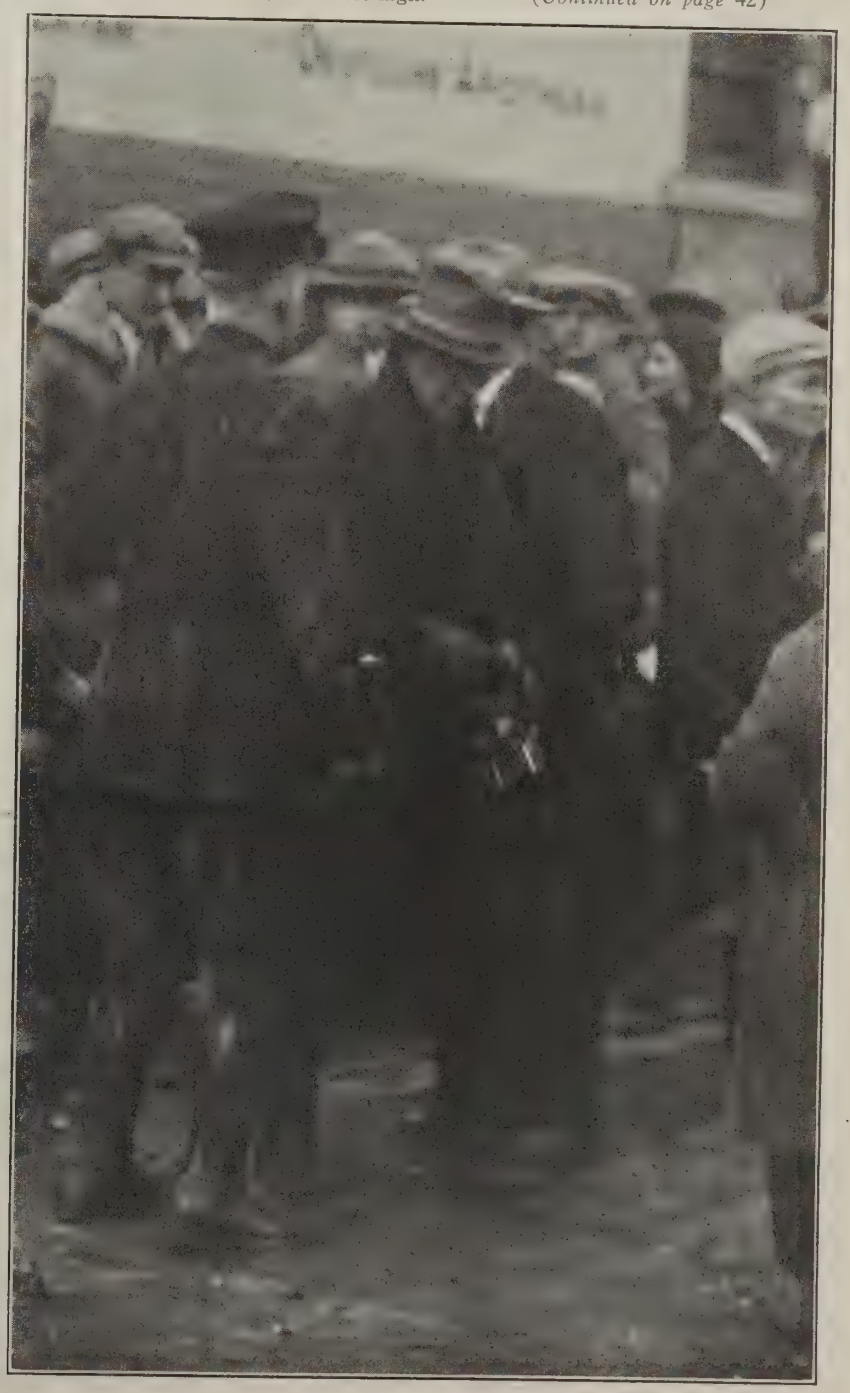
"The five who attacked the group in which I was standing had no other reason than to keep us from reporting the truth. They knew we represented newspapers and were not strikers. The men with me were wearing their police cards in their hats. I had out my paper and pencil."

Miss Dayton was at police headquarters when the riot call came in. With C. B. Allen, reporter on the New York World, a representative of the New York Times, and two local reporters she jumped into a taxi and made for the scene. Representing the Times were Lewis Stark and Charles S. Zerner.

By the time they arrived the crowd had largely broken up. The reporters began to question the strikers. Miss Dayton was taking notes. Five policemen bore down on the group.

"Move on," a policeman ordered. Miss Dayton, who is only five-feet three and a half inches tall, looked up into a ruddy face which seemed to loom ten feet high.

"I'm a newspaper woman," she answered him.



Then the policeman swore savagely, and knocked her in the arm with his club. With his left hand he grabbed the notes she was holding. When she protested and tried to clench them tighter, he struck her a second time. The blow fell stingingly on her knuckles. She released her grip. The policeman took the notes, tore them to shreds, and throwing them on the street scuffed them under his heel.

He was like "an excited and angry child," Miss Dayton wrote in the signed story printed by the Sun, March 4.

"This morning the chief of police of Passaic issued a statement that the police attacked only in self-protection. But I can assure him that these big policemen with their clubs and guns were in no physical peril, either from myself or any of the other men and women who were so ruthlessly and brutally attacked.

"From my vantage point in the taxi, I saw three persons, two of them young boys, thrown to the ground by a motorcycle officer. The attack seemed to me utterly unwarranted, for in this particular case the boys were merely walking

PRESS MUST AID LAW, SAYS JUDGE, BARRING MEN FROM MURDER TRIAL

Contends Publication of Testimony in Mississippi Case Would Prejudice Prospective Jurors Should Second Trial Be Necessary

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

BILOXI, Miss., Mar. 3.—The order of Judge Walter A. White, circuit judge of the coast judicial district of Mississippi, to prevent newspapers from publishing testimony in the trial of Jesse Favre, who is held for the murder of two Federal employes in South Mississippi has exploded a bombshell among newspaper men here.

JUDGE WALTER WHITE

On Feb. 19, W. M. Mingee and J. A. McLemore, two employes of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, were found murdered near the Mississippi entrance to the Pearl River bridge. Each had a wife and two children.

The supposed motive for the murder was that the victims who were mistaken for prohibition officers were killed by bootleggers who afterwards robbed them to mislead authorities.

Company M. 155th Infantry, National Guard, Mississippi, was mobilized Feb. 22, at Gulfport for the protection of Harold Jackson, then in jail there, arrested as one of the men thought to be responsible for the tragedy.

There was no possibility of gaining an interview with Jackson as the troops prevented all communication with him by the press. Favre was later arrested in connection with the murder.

On Feb. 24, the grand jury was impanelled by Judge White at Bay St. Louis and prepared to make preliminary investigations.

Jesse Favre was removed to New Orleans. Court officials quoted iron-clad instructions of Judge White against giving information to "reporters, editors and correspondents." The grand jury report has been awaited with intense interest.

Then Judge White forbade the publication of testimony in the murder case and declared that a cell in the Hancock County jail awaited the newspaper man who reported the testimony. The jail threat was contempt proceedings which the Judge declared would follow. He held that information or misinformation would defeat the ends of justice and that "some newspaper man may get a scoop on this trial, but if he does the court will get one, too."

He declared that news published would influence an intelligent jury.

"A good deal of misinformation has already appeared in newspapers in connection with this case," said Judge White. "Some have published what they conceived to be the truth or understood to be facts."

He held that no possible good could come from such publications. "Reporters or correspondents in the performance of their duty can see no harm, but the court does from the publication of news about this trial, and prohibits it," he said.

"With this suggestion to the newspapers if it is their purpose to serve the interest of their respective communities, they will not publish anything in reference to this case without reference of its subject matter to the court."

E. C. Sharp, special assistant attorney general of Mississippi, declared that "there is no law in Mississippi to prohibit the publication of testimony adduced in trials providing the trial is reported truthfully except in statutory cases named in Section 26 of the Constitution, when the court may exclude those who are not necessary to the proper conduct of the court."

Section 26 referred to, says: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have a right to be heard by himself or counsel, or both, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted by the witnesses against him, but, in prosecutions for rape, adultery, fornication, sodomy, or the crime against nature, the court may in its discretion, exclude from the courtroom all persons, except as are necessary in the conduct of the trial." The foregoing would naturally exclude reporters from gaining first-hand testimony in such cases.

A representative of EDITOR & PUBLISHER interviewed Judge White at his Biloxi home last night and was given the following statement:

"Hancock County is small and the number of qualified jurors in this county is limited. There may be more than one case to try where the testimony is involved. If the papers publish the testimony in one trial it will greatly interfere with the efforts of the court to secure intelligent jurors in case there should be other trials growing out of the murder. In my opinion, the press of the country should aid the court in the administration of the law."

On Monday last, a petition was filed by Favre's attorney setting forth, "that the publicity and notoriety attending Favre's arrest and subsequent imprisonment, and the printing of statements concerning the case, have resulted in adverse judgment and opinion and has engendered ill will against the defendant. On account of the publicity he cannot have a fair and impartial trial in Hancock county." Therefore a change of venue was sought which was over-ruled by Judge White.

Regardless of the ruling of Judge White, newspapers planned to "cover" the trial and correspondents were sent to the scene.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune, the Item and the States, and the Bay St. Louis Sea Coast Echo, are named in the petitions as newspapers which have given such harmful publicity and have published "headlines and damaging articles," to the detriment of the defendant's cause.

G. C. Moreau, editor of the Sea Coast Echo, submitted a story written for his newspaper to the court, which was deleted. When the petition for change of venue was heard, Judge White asked attorneys attending it not to ask questions of witnesses which would result in answers that might be used as testimony under the indictment. Witnesses were questioned about the newspaper publicity and their opinion was that the defendant could get a fair trial.

The Meridian (Miss.) Star made severe editorial comment and other papers are sharp in their comments on Judge White's attitude.

Jesse Favre was to go on trial in Bay St. Louis, Thursday, March 4, on a charge of murder with an injunction from the court to newspapers not to publish the testimony. A petition for a change of venue was denied.

Despite the fact that Judge White issued an order to newspapers to refrain from publishing the testimony, he was cordial to the several newspaper reporters present, permitting them to smoke in the enclosure and placing a table at their disposal. At yesterday's change of venue hearing, however, the order was not in effect as no testimony to be used in the trial was presented.

HOUSTON POST-DISPATCH WINS

Federal Court of Appeals Upholds Its Right to Use "Post-Dispatch"

The United States circuit court of appeals at New Orleans has sustained the decision of the federal district court at Houston in giving the Houston Post-Dispatch legal right to use of its name.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch had sued in an effort to prevent the Houston paper using the name "Post-Dispatch," and alleging copyright infringement.

Coast Chambers Seek Ad Slogan

Chambers of commerce of the Pacific Coast are seeking a slogan for use in the advertising campaign that is to be conducted to call attention to that part of the country. At conferences recently held in Seattle and San Francisco it was decided that each city or community which is conducting advertising campaigns will devote 15 per cent of its space to an all-Pacific Coast appeal.

JUDGES ADOPTING STRICTER ATTITUDE TOWARD NEWSPAPER COMMENTS

By LOUIS F. JORDAN

THE recent action of a judge of a New York court in citing for contempt, Harold S. Pollard, editor of the Evening World, and the sentence of Norman H. Parks in California causes an investigation of the law relative to the status of newspaper men, and especially editorials dealing with judicial acts of the judges of our land.

The law is interesting, and of a supplemental nature to the great body of law dealing with the Press. And in submitting additional views to those expressed in an article published in this journal in the issue of Aug. 15, 1925, it is, therefore, felt that the writer is not treading old ground but rather adding another chapter to the great, ever interesting and difficult subject, sometimes termed, "Freedom of the Press," but more particularly now, in view of judicial interpretation, "Obligation of the Press," either as newspaper men generally are effected, or editorial writers particularly. The word obligation is used advisedly in this connection and, it is believed for the first time. The reason is simple: Through the vast storehouses of our law reports there has been built a body of law that is easily determined and beyond the realm of conflict; and by virtue of this fact, the Press has an obligation more serious and more solemn, than ever before in the history of American newspaper publication.

We are dealing in this instance with the Courts. We are considering what decorum demands and the law commands when the editor makes comment relative to our judges or the judicial pronouncements of our judges.

First then, in analyzing the decisions of the courts themselves, we find the first blow to the old idea of Freedom in the language, reduced to a definition, by the composite rulings of several leading cases: "Liberty of the press as guaranteed by the Constitution does not permit publications respecting pending causes which are reasonably calculated to interfere with the due administration of justice. Hence the rule is now firmly settled that it is contempt to issue publications which are calculated to prejudice or prevent fair and impartial action in a cause of judicial investigation then pending, including those which influence judicial action by threats or other form of intimidation, which reflect on the court, counsel, parties, or witnesses, respecting the cause, or which tend to corrupt or embarrass the due administration of justice."

At the risk of being criticized for its length, the foregoing definition is given in full. It seemed necessary to commit what might be termed an error in doing this, because the definition is not only admirable, but should be a guide to the editorial writer whenever he takes pen in hand to discuss our courts. If such a rule had been followed in the recent Rhinelander case in New York, the opinion is advanced that both news articles and editorials appearing at the time the case was in progress, would have been tempered. A study of th rule as laid down will have far reachin effect in the future because not onl the public but the judges themselves ar becoming more and more zealous i construing the printing of news odiou to the administration of justice.

It has been held that even where news paper publication regarding the action o a court has taken place at a point remot from the sitting of the court, it will b held contemptuous if it reflects on th action of the court, impeaches its actio or integrity, or seeks to intimidate th court "in respect to its action in th case, by threat of popular clamor. People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195.

"Publications which charge that pe sons stigmatized as corruptionists an political thugs have such influence wit the Supreme Court," says the Cou in a Colorado case, "as to prevent th rendering of a decision by it in a caus wherein they had been convicted of crime and appealed to that court, an state that 'there must be influence some kind at work somewhere'. . . ther can be no earthly excuse for the Supren Court in any manner shielding them fro the punishment they so richly deserve.'

An Indiana case has declared: "Th language employed need not have brough the court into disrepute and endangere the want of proper respect, or have act ally embarrassed or impeded the pro ress of the court or the administratio of justice therein, if it was of a charact calculated to produce such effect." Ra v. State. 114 N.E. 866.

The rule has been well stated aga in a Washington case, where it is sai "The essence of the offense is condu reasonably calculated to produce an a mosphere of prejudice where a pendi case is to be tried."

"A newspaper article attacking th general practice of the police court sy tem, and charging abuses and etc., wit out specifying any particular case, is n a contempt." In Re Shannon 11 Mo tana, 67.

A specific instance of contempt is r cited by a judge who says: "While criminal information for libel was pen ing against one W, the defendant wro a letter to a newspaper, reflecting one of the judges who had deliver judgment on the application for su information, and stating that 'W was sure to be convicted as a libeler ev was before trial'." It was held th such offense was clearly a contempt court.

It is generally conceded that after case is ended, "The press and the pub have the right to freely discuss, critici and censure the decisions of the cour A number of states hold, however, "Th criticism of a judicial officer even thou made after the termination of the ca is contempt." One court has drawn nice distinction in this regard. In St v. Hildreth, 82 Vt. 382, the court clares, "The court draws the distincti between adverse criticism of the cour decision after the case is ended a 'scandalizing the court itself,' the lat is not 'criticism'; it is personal and sc rilous abuse of a judge as a judge. have, therefore, to deal with it as case of contempt, and we have to d with it brevi manu."

It will be seen that our judges are coming more and more zealous of th prerogatives. They resent any publi tion, which, by fair implication, is attack upon their integrity, and, fr what opinions we have read about ev in this brief summary of the matter contempt, it is safe to predict that e tors in the future will be watched m carefully than ever before in the hist of American law, since the advent of newspaper.

When we remember that, "It is c tempt to issue publications which calculated to prejudice or prevent f and impartial action in a cause pendi including those which influence judi action by threats or other forms of timidation, which reflect on the cou counsel, parties, or witnesses, respect the cause," we will have no doubt, idea different from that of first impr sion regarding the very solemn obli tions placed on the editor when he wr of our judges and their decrees.

PREMIUM CONTEST VIEWED ONE YEAR AFTER

Circulation Didn't Stick But Increased Ad Rate Did, Says Editor Giving Complete Analysis of Situation —Declares Editorial Merit Best Way to Build Newspaper Sales

By H. J. CAMPBELL

Editor, Vancouver (Wash.) Evening Columbian

The following frank discussion of premium circulation was presented in the form of an address by editor Campbell before the Fourteenth Annual Newspaper Institute of Washington at the University of Washington, Seattle, last week.

THE other day I heard some sweet music. It came from the lips of my circulation manager who came to me with the request that we take some steps to get more pep into the sporting page, with a view of increasing circulation.

Fellow publishers, this simple request is as its foundation, I believe, what would be the foundation of the circulation department of every newspaper published everywhere. I am firmly convinced that the only solid basis for growth of a periodical of any kind, daily, weekly, monthly or any other kind, is in making the publication so worth while that it will be purchased on its merits by its readers.

Now do not mistake me and think that I would say that the newspaper publisher should not solicit new business, or that he should not advertise his paper. The newspaper man preaches advertising, preaches every sort of tie-up for disposing of any sort of product, no matter how much merit it may have, and the publisher must realize better than anyone else that the finest product ever manufactured cannot be sold without the proper advertising, distribution and sales effort. He, too, must use these efforts in selling his product.

But sometimes the newspaper publisher uses too much effort to introduce his product and we find that instead of introducing the newspaper he is introducing some premium to the subscriber or some special prize to the solicitor which induces high pressure sales methods. The result is a subscription paid for, an article which has been sold and which the purchaser never really investigates on its merits because he may believe he has bought something else with the newspaper thrown in. With this idea of the value of the product impaired at the start, it is expecting a great deal to have the subscriber credit a greater value to the publication by the time the subscription is ready for a renewal.

One year ago this month I concluded a subscription "contest" on my paper, the Vancouver Evening Columbian. The contest had been continued from the day after Thanksgiving until Feb. 15, and when it was all over I gave the agency who handled the contest a statement to the effect that they had increased my circulation to the extent of 2,100 subscribers and that they had done a cash business for me in the contest of $21,000. These are round numbers and I will stick to round numbers in this discussion that you may follow the figures more clearly.

Now this statement was true enough and was what was shown at the time by the books as submitted by the circulation drive agents. But shortly after there followed a check and it was discovered that virtually half of the names which had been credited as new subscriptions were nothing other than renewals of those who had already been on the books, paying from month to month to the carriers. The cash part of it stood up. But let us examine that cash statement as to the cash. It was, in fact, the gross revenue from the contest.

When the men from the circulation agency came to me at the start of the contest they would make no predictions but one of them hazarded the "guess" that the contest would produce $15,000 in cash and not less than 1,000 increase of my list. I needed the 1,000 increase—of course no publisher in Washington ever needs $15,000 in cash—and so I buried some of the feelings I had on the subject of contests and told them to go ahead. They told me I would have to give away three automobiles, of aggregate value of about $1,500, and cash prizes of $600 additional. Then, they told me, I would pay them a flat 30 per cent commission on all cash collected and would also pay a commission of 20 per cent to all contestants who stayed in the contest from start to finish who did not win one of the main prizes. They informed me that this never amounted to much, that more than half of my business would come from contestants who were in the contest for only a few weeks and that almost all of the other half of the cash would be turned in by those who were winners of prizes.

Well, the contest, as I say, grossed $21,000. That meant that I paid the contest agents $6,300. But there was a fourth prize automobile rung in, midway in the contest, which they made a "contest within a contest" and it made the total of the automobile prizes run just about $7,800. Then there had been a $300 cash special Christmas prize interlarded into the contest and the three second prizes of $200 each made the total outlay for prizes $8,700, which added to the $6,300 paid the agency ran my costs up to $15,000. Then, instead of finding the 20 per cent commission to be negligible, I found that whatever might have been the practice of contestants in other contests, in mine they stuck too the bitter end and when it was all over I had to pay $2,200 in these 20 per cent commissions. Added to all this was an item of about $300 for "expenses" of the agents, printing, etc. That means that for my $21,000 gross business my coffers showed a gain of about $3,500 in cash.

There is another item of expense which I never figured. I never had the heart to do it, because I didn't want to show myself an utter idiot in having engaged in a newspaper contest. That was the item of advertising space used in the promulgation of that contest. It amounted to pages and pages. It started off with a double truck announcement and there were several other double truck ads in the course of the contest and almost every day a full page ad, with several smaller ads. In the 11 weeks of the contest I would judge that there were not less than 60 pages of advertising matter, to say nothing of the reams of news space, and the retail price of this matter would have run well over $3,000 at the lowest contract advertising rates.

We haven't attempted to figure that, though, and have counted the net return from the contest at $3,500 cash and 1,100 addition to our lists.

What did we get for that $3,500? We got a milked circulation revenue which in one year amounted to a drop of $7,200 in circulation revenues. Happily it is now almost over, since there were less than 400 on the list paid more than one year in advance, although some of these ran as much as six years in advance.

So, apparently, right now, a year after the contest, the circulation books show a dead loss of $3,700. And now, a year after the contest we are also able to judge something as to the staying qualities of those who subscribed. Of the expirations of those who came on our lists during the contest, about 50 per cent have renewed their subscriptions. This came not through voluntary mailing in of checks on the renewal date, but after a hard personal soliciation by trained field men. I am told that my percentage of renewals is one of which I may well be proud. We have managed to show a continual increase even after the close of the contest and the first big clean-up of the lists which ensued right after the close when we put every subscriber on a hard and fast cash-in-advance basis, and this has been true even in this month which contained our largest mortality list, but it hasn't been an easy task to do so.

Now for the other side of the ledger. I have said some harsh things about the financial aspect of that contest of mine, and now I have some offsets. The contest closed, as I said, on Feb. 15. On March 1, I instituted new advertising rates, based on the fact that my list had been increased. The increase was half a cent a line in the foreign field, or seven cents an inch, and an average of 6.8 in the local field. All in all it meant an increase in revenue from advertising of about $11,000 in the year, this being the increase from the revenues for the volume done in the preceding year. How much of the increase in volume in foreign business was due to the fact that we had shown a circulation gain, an A. B. C. gain of some 1,100 and how much is due to improved business conditions I am unable to say, but the fact remains that the increased foreign linage for the year has amounted to an additional $2,500 and there has been a like increase in the local linage. Our local increase in linage I attribute as much to improved business conditions locally as I do to any increase in our circulation.

So, all in all, our contest has not proved a financial flop. I am sure that I would not have been able to increase my foreign rates successfully without the increased circulation and, those business men in Vancouver would have slain me if I had attempted the increase I put over last March if I hadn't had that contest as the reason.

I let them know right from the start that the increased circulation would result in an increase in rates and when it was all over and we told them we had increased the list by 2,100 or about 60 per cent, we told them right out then that we were preparing a new schedule of rates. They began looking for a rate increase of about 60 per cent, or 50 per cent anyway, and when they received their notices of increase showing a rise which averaged less than seven cents they were positively grateful to me and looked on me as a public benefactor. I'd never have had the nerve to make that rate increase without that contest, nor would I have been justified in making it.

Now there we have the results of my contest. From a circulation standpoint I lost money in the year succeeding the contest. The increase in advertising revenues more than offset the loss in the circulation department. I also have my circulation revenue back to normal. The few hundred who paid from two years to six years during the contest are far more than offset by the increase in my circulation, so that my circulation revenue for the next year will be far larger than it was prior to the contest. I didn't make any money to speak of from the contest, taking it from every angle, in the last year, but I better than broke even and now I am in a position to reap a harvest as the result of my higher rates (which I must give the contest credit for procuring) and for a certain indefinite increase in circulation. About 350 of the 700 contest subscribers whose expirations have already come have renewed. In the meantime we have added enough names to take care of this shrinkage and any other stops which have come in through the year and to show a slight gain from our peak point immediately after the contest.

Would I advise any other publisher to engage in a contest such as I had last year? That depends. Had I to go through with it again, with exactly the same conditions, I believe I would do just what I did do, no matter how much I might dislike to do so. It wasn't a case of want to do it with me. I had to do it. I'll explain. I had put in an application to become a member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations. Immediately thereafter I learned that what I had been

"ROBBER" LIBELOUS BUT NOT WHEN APPLIED TO BASEBALL UMPIRE

Exposure to This Term Merely a Hazard of the Profession, Jury Indicates in Failing to Assess Damages Against Daily

(By Telegraph to Editor & Publisher)

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., March 1.—When does the term "robber" mean something else again?

Answer—when it is spoken or written with reference to a baseball umpire.

Judge Lucius Babcock of the district court of Oklahoma County, so instructed a jury trying the Oklahoma Publishing Company, publishers of the Daily Oklahoman and Oklahoma City Times, for alleged libel against Gerald W. Hayes and Edward P. Gaffney, Western League umpires, in Oklahoma City late last week.

After 12 hours of deliberation, the jury was discharged, being unable to reach a verdict. While it was suggested that the cases might never be retried, no statement was forthcoming from the attorneys for the publishers as to a settlement. It is understood the umpires wanted to settle for a nominal sum and the publication of a brief article in the sporting pages stating that the criticisms complained of intended no reflection upon the integrity of the arbiters.

Baseball fans who thronged the courtroom agreed that the hung jury, with the judge's instructions, was a clear victory for harsh criticism when the occasion demands.

It was reported that one juryman stated after the trial that the jury would like to have returned a verdict with no damages, but criticising a big newspaper for the use of intemperate language.

The jury is also said to have thought that it would be necessary to return a judgment of $100 in each of eight consolidated cases, if it found at all for the plaintiffs. The law in Oklahoma provides a minimum verdict of $100 in case of a verdict for the plaintiff in a libel suit.

The suit was the outgrowth of a series between the Oklahoma City Indians and the Omaha team in the Western League in June, 1924, and was unique in legal history. There is no other case on record where a referee or umpire of a sporting event has sued a newspaper for harsh criticism. But apparently it was a case of the worm turning.

The Oklahoma Publishing Company attempted to prove the truth of the statements published and among its witnesses had George Short, attorney general for the State of Oklahoma, Parker Lamoore, secretary to the Governor, Forrest Hughes, former county attorney, George Goff, chief of the fire department, and other officials and fans to testify that the brand of umpiring provided by the two plaintiffs was "putrid" "rotten" "terrible," "rankly dishonest and unfair" and "apparently impossible to call them so badly unintentionally."

During a three-day series, the newspapers referred to the umpires as "Henry Starr" Hayes and "Jesse James" Gaffney, using the names of two of the notorious bank robbers and Wild West "he-men" of the Southwest and used the following expressions: "A public nuisance," "Al Tearney bandits stick up tribe"; "prize baseball hijackers"; "robbers," "bandits," "swindlers."

Commenting on the case, Walter M. Harrison, managing editor, said:

"There is no question but that the language used was intemperate and in the light of a late winter sun, two years removed from the heat of battle, it sounds ridiculous. No situation justifies a newspaper that pretends to be ethical in using gutter language to chase an umpire and I do not think we will offend again, although opinion in Oklahoma City at the time among baseball fans was unanimous that the umpires were either blind or deliberately unfair."

Shortly after the incident, the Oklahoman and Times began handling all sport copy over the central copy desk.

"I do not think any man who comes hot from a battleground of any nature should have the last word with his own copy," Harrison said. "In most cases he overestimates the importance of his assignment and sometimes is forgetful of the effect of cold type."

Here is a portion of Judge Babcock's instructions particularly interesting to the newspaper fraternity:

"You are instructed that the language of the articles appearing in the defendant's publications were, in each instance, such as the law provides to be actionable of themselves; that is, language to which the law implies an injury resulting from the publication, and renders it unnecessary for the plaintiffs to prove any special damage. Injury to the plaintiffs is presumed from the use of the published language.

"To entitle the plaintiffs to recover, they shall only be held to prove that the articles were published by the defendant concerning the plaintiffs. This is admitted by the defendant and was there no other evidence in the case, it would be your duty to find a verdict for the plaintiffs but the defendant has pleaded and offered evidence, for the purpose of proving that the articles published were true and you are instructed that under the circumstances of this case, this would be a complete defense to these actions, for publishing the truth would not be libel.

"In determining whether the articles were true, in your consideration of such articles and publications, you should take into consideration the facts, circumstances and conditions surrounding said publications including the fact that they were published about, of and concerning the playing and umpiring of certain baseball games. You are further entitled to and should take into consideration your own knowledge, if any, as well as any evidence, if any, relative to words and language ordinarily employed and used concerning the playing of baseball games of and concerning the ordinary conduct of umpires at such games.

"You should take into consideration the entire article or publication and all of the language used therein in arriving at the true import and effect of any such article or publication and not single out alone any particular word or words.

"In determining what amount the plaintiffs should recover, you are entitled to and should take into consideration the fact that they were written and published of and concerning the conduct of the plaintiffs while engaged in umpiring the playing of baseball games and if it be a fact that different language, words and expressions are customarily and ordinarily used toward, of and concerning persons engaged in such occupations than is ordinarily and customarily used toward, of and concerning persons engaged in other and different avocations, you are entitled to take such facts and circumstances into consideration in determining the effect of the articles and publications under consideration."

THREE ST. PAUL CARRIER BOYS WIN MEDALS FOR 100 PER CENT ROUTES

THREE carrier boys of the St. Paul Dispatch and Pioneer Press were recently awarded gold medals and a prize of $10 in gold for building the first "100 per cent routes"—routes upon which every resident is a subscriber, receiving 12 hours service, morning and evening delivery.

The three youths, William Goodman, 15, Jack Gardner, 18, and Sylvan Livitan, 16, were honored at the regular meeting of the Town Criers Club. They are all pupils of Central high school, St. Paul.

Speaking of the circulation feat accomplished by these carriers J. A. Mathews, director of circulation for the dailies said:

"In all my experience I do not remember of any cities having 100 per cent routes, and especially the size of these routes in St. Paul. Goodman carries 128 papers to 128 families on his route; Gardner 164 papers to 164 houses, and Livitan 158 papers to 158 houses.

"The carriers in promoting 100% routes solicit their customers in nearly every case. A few cases were handled by the office and in some cases the carrier was advised because in securing some of these non-subscribers it was necessary to handle practically everyone as an individual case."

WARN LONDON WRITER TO LEAVE ITALY

Il Tevere, Fascist Daily, Hints at Violence—Gen. Cesare Rossi Promises "Inside Story" of Mussolini Dictatorship

With Gen. Cesare Rossi, former head of the Fascist Press Bureau, in Paris promising to "give to the world the inside story of the rise of Fascismo," and with a London correspondent threatened by the Fascisti in Rome, Premier Benito Mussolini's relations with the press this week again reached boiling point.

Il Tevere, Rome's extreme Fascist paper, on Feb. 27, published an open letter threatening violence against the Rome correspondent of the London Daily Express, unless "he" leaves Italy, objecting to a recent story stating that Premier Mussolini was in such ill health that he was forced to live on a starvation diet. Lady Drummond Hay is a "special correspondent" of the Daily Express, who a short time ago interviewed Mussolini.

The paper declared:

"We Fascisti do not desire to seek out this correspondent, nor do we desire to be constrained to put him with our compliments under the hoofs of the horse on which the Duce takes his daily ride."

Therefore, it says to the President of the association:

"If you—and you undoubtedly do—find the activities of this vile scribbler disgusting, we urge you to advise him to make a change of surroundings."

Thomas P. Topping, attached to the Paris bureau of the Associated Press who is in Nice reporting the tennis matches, discovered Gen. Rossi in the city on Feb. 27. He quoted him as saying:

"Threats, even bodily harm, will not prevent me from giving the world the inside story of the rise of Fascismo in Italy, created for a good cause and then prostituted by Benito Mussolini.

"Mussolini is the man responsible for the murder of Deputy Matteoti. The others who go to trial for his murder on March 16 are simply pawns in a cheap game which they don't understand."

"I remember you," said Gen. Rossi to the correspondent. "I had my picture taken with you on Pinicio Hill that memorable October day in 1923 when we entered Rome and Italy was before us. What has Fascismo done with our country? Anarchy, murder, riots and a perpetual state of internal war for the greater grandeur of Mussolini.

"I shall be glad to get out of here and go to Paris. There I will tell the world a story, appalling in its perversity. I have many friends in the United States and they shall have an opportunity to learn the story of the rise and of the coming fall of Mussolini. I am going to Paris where, with friends, I shall put the finishing touch, a memorandum which will be similar to the document sent from the Regina Coeli prison in Rome in 19[illegible]. The world wants to know about Fascismo, and the world shall know."

Topping is a former New York newspaper man. He has been with the A. P. more than 10 years.

In New York this week Mussolini was attacked by George W. Wickersham, American member of the "Commission of Fifteen for the Codification of International Law" of the League of Nations.

"A state of absolute tyranny reigns over Italy under his dictatorship," he said. "There has been an utter destruction of freedom of speech and of freedom of the press. The lives of everyone are under the supervision of a vigilante type of government."

SELLING SERVICE, NOT GOODS, TO THE BUYERS

Advertising Tries Too Hard to Sell Merchandise, Is Opinion of Henry P. Williams, Chicago Agency Man—Stores Should Advertise Themselves and Service They Perform, Is His Theory

Institutional advertising receives varied praise and condemnation from the fraternity, and it persists despite brickbats and does credit frequently to bouquets. A strong argument in its favor is herewith offered in this, the sixth of a series of articles discussing the present advertising trend.

The protagonist is Henry P. Williams, Chicago advertising agent, who believes that the study of advertising should begin with a study of buying, not selling.

'ADVERTISE service, not merchandise to the buyers," seems staring when put in the mouth of a present ty advertising agency man. And yet it the essence of some advice handed out e other day by Henry P. Williams, airman of the board of Williams & nningham, Chicago advertising agents. Mr. Williams is of the unorthodox inion that advertising often tries too rd to sell merchandise. Explaining s theory he tells the following anecte:

"I once discussed with a prominent ker of kitchen cabinets the subject of s advertising. He spread his scrap loks before me, a complete exhibit of year's advertising program. He asked r comments on it. It looked good so as illustration and display and typoaphy was concerned; and I said so.

" 'But you are trying too hard to sell chen cabinets.'

'He looked surprised and said 'What you imagine I am spending $150,000 nually for if it's not to sell kitchen inets? I guess you don't understand purpose of advertising.'

" 'I think I understand,' I said. 'But ir advertising is so manifestly a de-, an anxiety to sell, that it defeats lf. You're really not selling kitchen inets; you're selling an efficiency vice in a kitchen; a saving of time and or for the woman who works in a chen. The kitchen cabinet is the ans by which you deliver that service. l the service, not the mechanism; the ult, not the merchandise.'

He couldn't see it. My observation is t very few men do see it. There is, wever, something more that the pubwants beside the use of the thing ght. Generally speaking, you will find buyers feel very helpless when they goods. You know how attractive r poor merchandise can be made to c. A carefully applied wood stain, a of two of varnish, a skillfully apld piece of fabric, can make very inor merchandise look very good. ple do pride themselves—especially nen—on their expert skill in judging ity. But you know and I know, how it is to fool them.

One thing people want, though they be reluctant to admit it, is some- and something they can trust. A r prefers to do business with a man, store in which he has confidence; re he feels that he will get for his ey the real value he wants, and exs. Now one of the best uses of adsing is to develop and cultivate this ng of security in your store and in fy theory of advertising and selling sed on this psychological theory of uyer's mind. I believe that the buympulse is not most effectively moved rice considerations. Every buyer of handise is attracted by an opportunity t goods at a saving of money. The e for a bargain is universal. But the e for quality is also universal. No ever deliberately buys poor merlise; but an amazing amount of it sold every year. Why is it, do you , that people buy cheap, unworthy ture; poorly made, of inferior ma-s, badly finished; with cheap upholt?

ey wouldn't buy such stuff if they what it was. They see its very low compared with good merchandise; ey think it's good. You know, and w that low prices and high quality n go together. The point is, that uyer thinks it's good. He believes getting good quality, or real value. dvertising may say so. The salesmay give unqualified assurances. dea that's in the buyer's mind may sfied by these assurances, and the s made.

"It is my opinion that most buyers are influenced more by the store and its personality than by prices or by appearances in goods. It is my policy as advertising counsellor, to advertise, not so much the prices and the qualities, as the store itself. I am convinced that more buyers are led by a sense of security in dealing with a store, or an individual person in the store, than by any other consideration.

"The most important thing we have to deal with, in advertising or selling, is this fact, that men and women are primarily interested in themselves. They buy furniture, or groceries, or clothes, or automobiles, not because somebody has these things to sell, and wants to sell them, but because the buyer, either consciously or unconsciously, is convinced that in buying the particular merchandise involved he is gaining an advantage for himself, as well as satisfying a need or desire.

"I am sure buyers never analyze this motive; it is pretty largely unconscious. But sellers can analyze it and base selling and advertising on it. A chair, for example, is something more than a piece of merchandise, at a specific price. It may be a mere utility, like a kitchen chair; or it may have in addition to utility a decorative and artistic value. But a chair whatever its character, by its essential nature, implies somebody to sit in it, or on it; that's what a chair is for. Advertising or selling a chair, and to some extent selling a chair, must take into account this personal equation. The art of advertising, and the art of selling, therefore, deal with uses, rather than the bare materials of merchandise. And in selling as well as in advertising, the imagination of the seller and the advertiser has a large part to play.

"There is a sense in which we may say, truthfully, that nobody really buys merchandise at all. In reality your customer really buys and pays for something else than the mere merchandise. I think it of the highest importance that we keep this fact in mind, both as sellers and as advertiser.

"The function of good business is really simply to render a service to the public. And the function of advertising is to tell them about it. The greatest of all teachers once said: 'If any among you would be greatest of all, let him be a servant.' It is very evident that in the sense in which He used the word servant, He did not mean the common idea of servanthood—a valet, porter, lackey. He meant, I think, the sort of a servant that Lincoln was, or Edison, or others of that type; such a servant as He himself was.

" 'It is no wonder,' says Walter Lippmann, 'that business is such a sordid affair. We have done our best to exclude from it every passionate interest that is capable of lighting up activity with eagerness and joy. We have called "unbusinesslike" the devotion of the craftsman and scientist. We have actually pretended that the work of extracting a living from nature could be most successfully done by short-sighted money-makers, encouraged by their money-spending wives. We are beginning to know that this nation, with all its boasts, has never touched the real possibilities of business success; that nature and good luck have done most of our work; that our achievements have come in spite of our ignorance. And so no man can gauge the civilizing possibilities of a new set of motives in business. That it will add to the dignity and value of millions of careers is only one of its blessings.'

"I have a feeling that in the development of this idea that the highest function of business is to be a servant may present to us this 'new set of motives' for which Mr. Lippmann pleads.

"I find that it is rather a new idea to the average business man that he can succeed best in his undertaking by being a servant. It takes a long time for it to sink in. Every man in business wants success; it is apt to startle him a little to hand him this formula—'if you want to be great, be a servant.' He comes to see after a while something of what it means; and then maybe he tries it. After he tries it, and as soon as he does try it, he finds that his busine: begins to grow; not because he tries to make it grow, but because he tries to make it serve.

"He sees after a while that service is not merely something that you do, but rather something that you feel; not an act but a spirit. He finds that business conducted in such a spirit grows great; it gains the larger rewards, because it doesn't work for the reward, but for the service.

"I can see no reason why any business cannot be done in such a spirit; and if it is done in that spirit, the advertising problem is a very simple one."

PROTESTS BEER RECIPE

Rep. Blanton Would Prosecute Washington Post Editor

Action against the editor of the Washington Post for publication of George Washington's beer recipe in the March 2, issue was demanded of President Coolidge by Representative Blanton, Democrat, Texas.

Publication of the recipe, the Texas representative charged on the floor of the House, constituted a violation of the prohibition law.

Big Salmon Advertising

Starting with $200,000 to advertise the salmon industry, Northwest fisheries may expend $500,000 in the campaign. C. A. Burkhardt is president of the Association of Pacific Fisheries. An educational campaign was decided upon recently at Seattle.

CARL D. GROAT NAMED U. P. CAPITOL CHIEF

Succeeds William J. Losh, Resigned—Wilson Becomes Cable Editor in New York—D. N. Parry Joins Service of United News

Carl D. Groat, formerly Berlin manager of the United Press, and more recently New York cable editor, has been appointed manager of the U. P. Washington bureau, succeeding William J. Losh, resigned to enter business for himself in California.

CARL D. GROAT

Lyle C. Wilson, cable editor of the United News, succeeds Groat in New York. Wilson has had foreign experience in the Berlin and London bureaus of United News. He returned to this country two years ago. Duke N. Parry, formerly with the International News Service, has joined United News to take over the desk vacated by Wilson. Parry most recently was publisher of a newspaper in Missouri. He has been associated with the Kansas City Star, the Tokio Japan Advertiser, and Stars and Stripes, the latter while in France during the war.

While still in h igh school, Groat started newspaper work in 1906 on the Pittsfield (Mass.) Eagle. Following graduation from Dartmouth College, he joined the staff of the Springfield (Mass.) Union, subsequently going to Washington to work for the Washington Times.

From the latter newspaper, he became a staff correspondent in the capital for the U. P. Then he became manager respectively of the Chicago, Dallas, Denver and San Francisco bureaus, returning to Washington later.

HUNTRESS HEADS TEXAS GROUP

Publishers' Association Adopts Resolution Asking Lower Postal Rates

Frank G. Huntress Jr., of the San Antonio Express, was elected president of the Texas Newspaper Publishers' Association at the annual meeting held in Dallas last week. W. C. Mayborn of the Southwestern Scripps-Howard group was named vice-president, and A. E. Clarkson of the Houston Post-Dispatch, secretary-treasurer.

G. J. Palmer of the Houston Chronicle was re-elected as special commissioner, having direct charge of wage negotiations.

The association adopted the following resolution on second class postage rates:

"RESOLVED: That it is the sense of the Texas Newspaper Publishers' Association that the best interest of the public will be served by a reduction of second class postage rates to a basis not higher than the 1919 schedule, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Texas delegation in Congress."

DOUGLAS FIR CAMPAIGN

West Coast Lumber Men to Spend $300,000 in Advertising

Further steps have been taken in the advertising campaign by the lumbermen of the Pacific Northwest to promote the sale of Douglas fir. The campaign is in the hands of the West Coast Trade Extension bureau.

It is proposed to spend $450,000 in the campaign, a levy of 5 cents being made on every 1,000 feet of lumber cut by members of the bureau. Of this total, $300,000 will be spent for space in newspapers and magazines. Henry Schott, associate editor of the Nation's Business, has obtained leave of absence to organize the campaign.

A Costume For Palm Beach Gives Advance News Of Spring Styles

THE annual migration of the fashionables to Palm Beach calls forth the efforts of eminent style creators for warm weather apparel, while the snow still remains to remind us that Winter is still here. But there is a silver lining to the cloud, if it be one, of belonging to the large majority which must take its seasons as it finds them. For, from the lovely frocks and coats designed for wear under southern skies, the canny woman may derive advance information of what the mode will be for Spring and Summer

And so Paris sends us the charming costume illustrated As gay and nonchalant as its color combination of white and rose, it illustrates the tendency to wear with sport or daytime dresses an accompanying short coat, which may often be of an entirely different material, linking itself only with the dress by means of some detail of color or trimming.

The dress shown is of white Frostkrepe, the bodice slightly drawn to the figure (a very new trend) and the skirt arranged in groups of pleats giving ample freedom for active participation in sports. The dress is practically sleeveless, but this deficiency is amply provided for by the comfortable little jacket of rose duvetyne which accompanies the frock The jacket has groups of silk stitchings which terminte in a fan-shaped decoration of arrowheads, and this detail is repeated in the trimming of the dress

A piquant effect is achieved by the rose-colored scarf knotted loosely in bandit fashion around the throat.

"BY Cheney."

Observe this art signature attached to fashion drawings sent out in mat form "free" to easy editors by Cheney Brothers, the big silk house.

Which one of the famous brothers is responsible for the crude line drawings? There is an artist among them, but EDITOR & PUBLISHER does not for an instant believe that "By Cheney" means that he is guilty of the rough drawings.

It would be a sort of "clever" way of getting an advertising line into the alleged "Cheney Style Service." We believe that the line is attached to the cut for advertising purposes and justifies the "gift" of the mats.

Patient readers will also observe that the "Cheney Style Service" is directed by Henri Creange. This gentleman happens to be the head designer for the big silk concern. Does he really conduct this free "service" for the press, in the sense that one usually expects a syndicate director to run a service? Maybe so, one may never be sure what men will do to get free advertising in this country.

Sometimes, in the Cheney handouts, one reads of the great dress authority "Rex Cheney," who, if he declares that they are wearing 'em shorter, carries the weight of a king's decree. But who is Rex Cheney? Advices from the New England home town of the Cheney family fail to disclose a Rex Cheney. Does he live? Is he real?

After all, what does good old Edward Bernays, the iron-nerved press agent, popularly supposed to be employed by Cheney Brothers to graft free space from the newspapers, do as his bit in the audacious "style service" performance? Why, he doesn't even conduct it. His name does not appear on the proof sheets. But somehow, whether it be justified in fact or not, EDITOR & PUBLISHER feels that somewhere behind the silken shop talk and those Cheney trademarks the figure of Mr. Bernays stalks. If so, dear editors, every time you print a Cheney "free" style you may be sure that a given number of dollars will roll in the direction of Mr. Bernays, collector of fees for advertising which you charitably donate.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE SUES TO RECOVER CITY CASH

Seeks Return of $1,693,000 Paid to Real Estate Experts Under Thompson Regime—13 Lawyers in Court

After five years, taking of evidence has began in the suit in chancery by which the Chicago Tribune, as a taxpayer, seeks to recover for the city $1,693,000 paid to real estate experts in 1920 during the William Hale Thompson administration.

The case is being heard by Chief Justice Hugo M. Friend of the Circuit Court.

That a long legal fight is in the offing was indicated when the hearing opened this week with 13 attorneys in court, ten for the defendants and three for the plaintiff and abstruse legal points were brought out in outlining the complaint and the defense.

Attorney Weymouth Kirkland, representing the Tribune, told the court that it is their contention that the payment of per cent of the value of the property evaluated by the experts, and a $50 a day fee for testifying in the subsequent court procedure, was not authorized by the city council. It is their further contention, he said, that the appropriation of Feb. 1920, was $225,000 and that no expenditures over that amount were legal.

At the close of Mr. Kirkland's statement, Attorneys George Miller and Albert Fink, representing the three real estate experts, Ernest H. Lyons, Edward C. Waller, Jr., and A. S. Merigold, who received approximately $570,000 each for work done in one year, outlined the defense.

The defense holds, the attorneys said that the contracts made with the experts by the board of local improvements were legal and that the prices paid them were known to and approved by the city council.

Attorney Fink told the court if the plaintiffs would consent to drop conspiracy charges in their petition, the defendants would submit their claims to the court.

Attorney Chester Cleveland, representing Public Administrator Percival Coffin, who was an employee of the board of local improvements during 19 moved that the suit against Coffin be dismissed, asserting that Coffin's connection with the transactions was so remote that he could not be held responsible, regardless of the outcome of the suit. Judge Friend took no action on the motion.

Besides the defendants named, the following are listed in the Tribune's petition:

Former Mayor William Hale Thompson; former City Controller George Harding; Charles M. Nichols, Arnold Brautigam, Frank J. Koch. The city of Chicago was originally a defendant, but is now aiding the Tribune in its suit, since there has been a change of administration.

STEVICK BUYS TWO MORE

Champaign Publisher Now Owns Texarkana Dailies

David W. Stevick, publisher of the Champaign (Ill.) News-Gazette, 24 hours after he had bought the Texarkana (Ark.) Daily Texarkanian, last week surprised Texarkana business circles by announcing he also had purchased the Texarkana (Tex.) Four States Press (morning) and Journal (evening) from the Four States Press Company, of which C. E. Palmer was president. Texarkana is a city partly in Arkansas and partly in Texas. The Texarkanian is an evening paper conducted by J. L. Wadley.

Consideration involved in the Four States Press and Journal deal was not revealed, but was said to be several hundred thousand dollars. Stevick said his plans were not altogether complete, but he intended to discontinue one of the afternoon paper, possibly the Journal which was established only six months ago.

The Texarkanian and Press use Associated Press service, the Journal the United Press.

UNINFLUENCED DAILY IS RETAILER'S BEST BUY

Merchants Realizing Editorially Independent Newspapers Bring Greatest Advertising Results, Says Retail Group Executive—Gives Co-operation Ideas

RETAIL merchants are learning through experience that the best advertising medium they can use is an editorially independent newspaper which has built up high reader confidence in its news columns through avoidance of free puffs, George V. Sheridan, executive director of the Ohio State Council of Retail Merchants told members of the Associated Ohio Dailies at their meeting recently in Columbus.

Mr. Sheridan, who is a former publisher of the Springfield (O.) Sun, discussed at length the co-operation which can exist between merchants and newspapers.

"My chief criticism of the newspaper industry is that many newspaper publishers haven't the backbone and courage to charge a rate sufficient to permit them to develop and maintain the type of newspaper which would best serve the community," he declared.

His address, in part, follows:

Newspaper advertising after years of severe tests has so demonstrated its value that newspaper properties today are unusually sound business propositions. They will continue to be sound financially so long as retail stores continue to be the chief agency of merchandise distribution in America. The retail merchant will never discontinue liberal use of newspaper advertising space, regardless of other substitutes which may be offered. He need only review the experience of those retail institutions which have made outstanding and enduring successes.

Other forms of advertising are developed for his consideration but the result-demanding merchant quickly finds that they have only limited value. Many felt that radio, through broadcasting which reaches millions of people, might eventually supplant the newspaper as an advertising medium. This can never be. No store will ever trust its main merchandising messages to the inaccuracies of the spoken word.

We might debate the question as to whether a good newspaper is responsible for prosperous stores, or the contrary. Each is in some degree dependent on the other, but I defy any one to develop an independent, enterprising and vigorous newspaper in a city where the main retail operations are not in progressive hands. The reason, of course, is that in these expensive times it takes real money to make a newspaper enterprising, vigorous and independent. An unprofitable newspaper property can never develop a real newspaper.

These facts are clear enough when one examines the existing situation, but many publishers fail to recognize them. It seems to me that many newspaper publishers, in their dealings with their merchants, have unconsciously placed a chip on their shoulder or have assumed an inherently antagonistic attitude. I believe that I can understand this as a result of my newspaper experience. Many years ago when newspapers were struggling and financially half-starved, and merchants did not fully appreciate the actual cash value of the space they were buying, it was not uncommon for the merchant to attempt to influence the editorial policy of the paper he was supporting. It was hardly less unusual for him to succeed. Gradually, however, as newspapers fell into stronger hands and their operation was placed on a more business-like basis, this condition disappeared completely. Newspaper publishers realized that if they were to have anything to sell which would be of value to a space buyer, it must be based primarily upon an editorial independence which would develop reader confidence. Merchants, as advertising costs mounted and actual advertising results were demonstrated year after year, likewise learned through experience that space in a newspaper which they could influence through a pecuniary consideration was not worth influencing.

I believe publishers will agree with me that today merchants, regardless of the size of their advertising appropriations, do not show even the slightest inclination to interfere with the editorial policy of any newspaper which they deem worthy of their patronage. But isn't it true that in some degree at least the old fear of possible attempts at domination still exists in the minds of the newspaper management? Doesn't this account in some degree for the failure of many newspaper publishers to realize that they and their merchants have common problems of an immediate and vital nature, the solution of which is mutually important?

There are other current factors which serve to cause these two leading agencies of community development to operate in a more or less hostile spirit. We might as well discuss the situation frankly. I know from personal experience that many publishers privately regard a local retail merchants association as some sort of a secret device to fight local advertising rates. Because the rate question is always before you as an important factor in your affairs, you quite naturally feel that it is the main reason for merchants banding together. This probably is inflamed in nearly every community by memories of by-gone days when merchants grouped together and attempted a newspaper boycott as a rate adjustment club.

Let us consider for a moment the situation in recent years, since retail operations have attained the present levels and newspapers have reached their established economic position. To the best of my knowledge in ten years there hasn't been a successful rate boycott in this country, and only isolated attempts. Under modern conditions such a boycott would be absolutely impossible.

Retailing is a highly competitive business, with tremendous overhead which requires constant sales volume to maintain. In no business activity is competition more bitter. I cannot name a city in Ohio where if a rate boycott were attempted against a newspaper, one or more leading stores would not immediately attempt to profit by such a situation and double their space requirements in the newspaper so attacked. This, as you know, would break any boycott in 24 hours, despite the most iron-clad preliminary agreement. The other merchants would immediately figure that their rival was trying to steal their field.

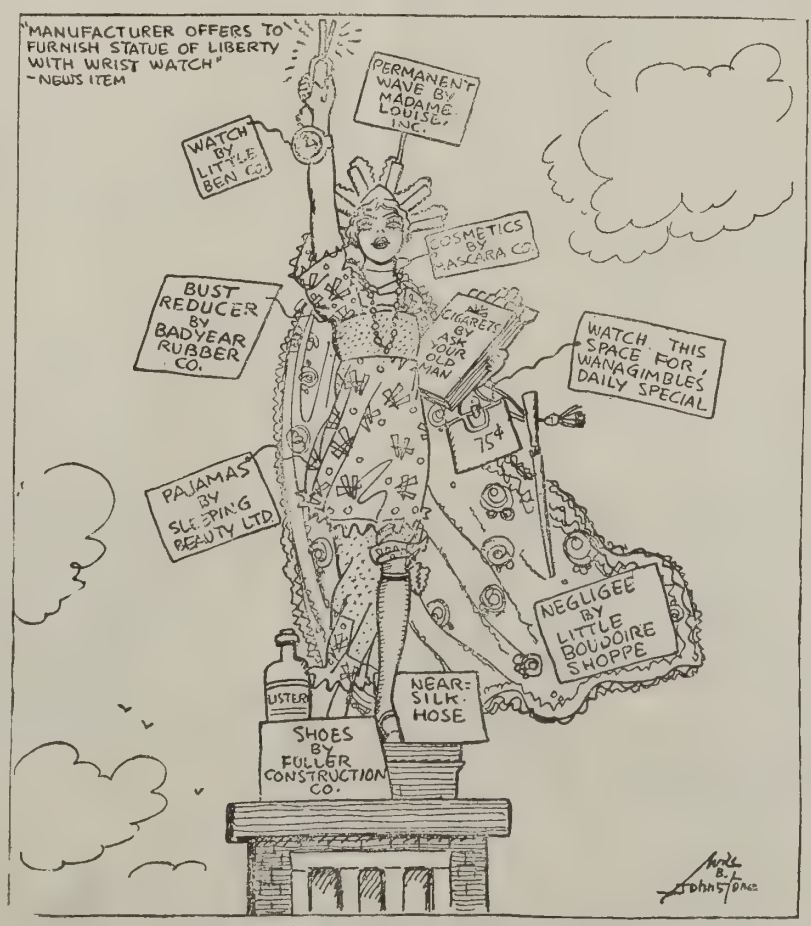
Furthermore, retail organizations have come to assume a different attitude toward newspapers. In recent years, retailers have turned to the established methods of scientific research as an aid in the solution of their business problems. In this they are far ahead of the newspaper industry, which seemingly ignores the advantages of scientific research work. Our investigators, headed perhaps by Harvard University, have reduced the analysis of advertising costs to a somewhat scientific basis. They have proved over a period of years that honest and intelligent advertising, based on a percentage of business done, will produce certain sales volumes and that if other operation factors are correct, these volumes will produce certain net profits. They have produced formulas which a merchant may automatically follow. The facts gathered by these investigators after years of study have convinced the merchants of the direct cash value of advertising.

Further, this scientific analysis of modern advertising has demonstrated that the character of the medium used is a very important factor. Scientifically and actually it has been demonstrated that a newspaper to be a good advertising medium must be enterprising and independent, and that it can not be such unless it is assured of a profitable operation. You will find throughout the country that merchants seldom object to the rates charged by the newspapers which are real leaders in their community. The universal trend seems to be toward paying a rate that will permit the newspaper which serves the merchants' community to develop the type of publication which will entirely blanket the trading territory.

This doesn't mean that newspapers will ever succeed in charging unwarranted rates. Merchants today have easy comparative access to newspaper rate schedules in cities throughout the land. The Audit Bureau of Circulations has taken much of the guess-work out of space buying, even from a local standpoint. The smart publisher today is the one who is seeking to protect the tremendous institutional value of his newspaper property, and to insure it continued profits through years to come. He is much too smart, under modern conditions, to attempt a rate gouge which would alienate the good will of those to whom he must look for continued financial support. He knows that if he imposes an unfair rate, his customers, the local merchants, will know it.

My chief criticism of the newspaper industry is that many newspaper publishers haven't the backbone and the courage to charge a rate sufficient to permit them to develop and maintain the type of newspaper which would best serve their community.

Recapitulating, therefore, it is fair to assume that a part of the present-day antagonism between newspapers and merchants, which prevents them from realizing that they have tremendous common problems, is due to the ancient bogey of attempted editorial denomination and the likewise antiquated bogey of attempted rate denomination.



I have endeavored to summarize the present-day factors which tend in some degree to keep these two great interests apart. Let me for a moment analyze certain broad general conditions which absolutely prove that the interests of the newspaper and the merchant are identical. This is true to such an extent that in many situations these two groups are justified in waging a common battle against certain other interests in the community.

Consider the broad question of industrialism, for example. Your large manufacturing enterprise, criefly concerned in producing commodities for a national market and having little direct concern with business in its home city, may and quite often is directly concerned in the maintenance of a generally low wage scale. A newspaper property, on the other hand, prospers where wage levels are higher, living conditions are better and citizens generally have the leisure and opportunity to appreciate their newspaper and other modern refinements of living. The same is entirely true of the merchant. Good wages and pleasant living conditions produce good retail customers.

Consider the good-roads question. Development of hard-surface road systems has been the chief factor in the comparatively recent development of large newspaper circulations. Good roads build cities. They make possible quicker and more intensive mail distribution, more radiating truck and bus lines, and give your paper access to new circulation territory. The merchants, although they are large tax payers, have an interest absolutely identical with yours. Stores

I have known a $10 cash prize to bring in 20,000 answers in one day. Nowadays the prize money must run into thousands to get action.

Today they are conducted on a more dignified basis, and must conform strictly to the postoffice requirements. No purchases are required as they were in the old days.

Even contests are not used as extensively. Offering money for ideas, suggestions, designs for a trade-mark package, has passed out to give room to more scientific methods of publicity. I was always a scheme worker. It was a fascinating game and stirred my imagination. Ideas and stunts came with a thrill. It was through promoting some novel contests that I landed some of my best jobs.

The success of the Busy Bee Sugar Cookie Boy Contest made me vice-president of an agency, and later landed me on the editorial staff of System Magazine.

I found a good berth on the Cincinnati Post working a free scheme for a furniture store and a soap manufacturer, which later ran as feature stories in advertising journals.

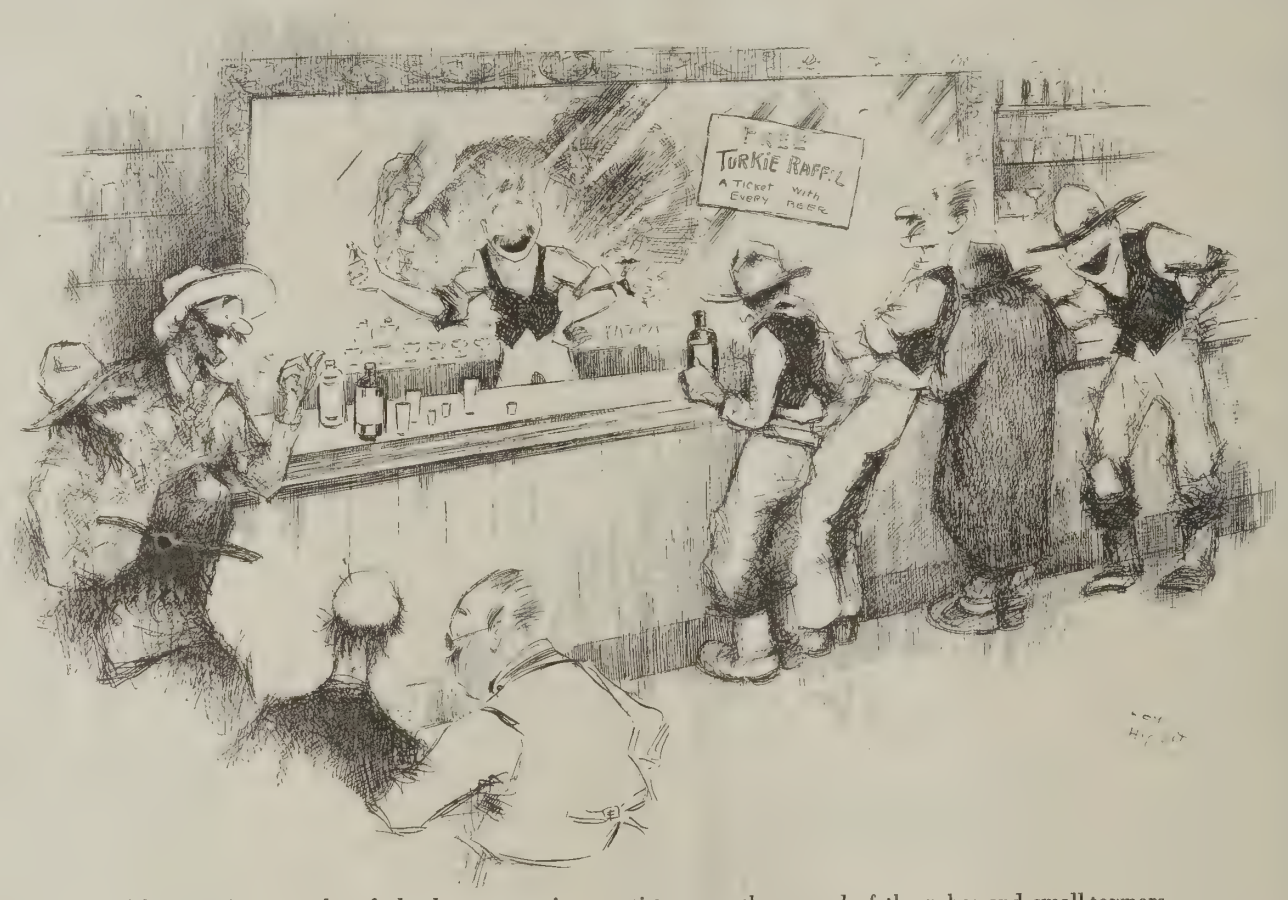
I started my most interesting advertising adventure with the Chicago Tribune through the "What Foods Do You Buy" contest. Big money prizes were offered to housewives for writing about the advertised foods they bought and their reasons for buying them.

Prize contests, schemes, stunts were important milestones all along the bumpy advertising road I have traveled.

It has always been a great adventure to rub elbows with advertising men noted for their ingenuity in keeping up a vaudeville-like succession of stunts for getting trade.

There are a thousand and one scheme contests that have been used where competition has been so keen that stunts were necessary for attracting the attention of the elusive customer.

But the good old days of free schemes—the good old days of come-on stunts—the good old days of quick, easy money are gone forever.



Chapter XXXII

Bar-Room Mirror Artists

IN looking backward and dreaming over all those old, bold, brainy, adroit, clever boys—bums, rogues and villains whom I have met, hobnobbed with, or heard about while wandering or carousing around in the advertising game, the "Wandering Willie" Artists stand out like a red seal.

It was a life of strange and picturesque adventure in those far off days when the most startling advertising a bar-room ever did was to have its windows and mirrors all decorated up with the gay colors, mixed up and spread into masterpiece paintings by strange adventurers.

The memories of advertising adventurers in those days are closely associated with brilliant colors, free lunch, and popular songs of that day. Memory paints all those old pictures in different tints and shades. Recollections of names, places, faces, and events come readily in company with the remembered songs of yesterday. Painted saloon mirrors, scenes from afar off lands, the tunes of "There'll be a hot time," "Under the bamboo tree," "Oh, give us a drink bartender," etc., these things were a part of the picture which memory brings to light.

The artistic triumphs of the bar-room mirror artists were the marvel of the rubes and small-towners.

These artists of the road were also expert window dressers. Their talents ran just as ofttimes did their bright colors on the mirrors. Sign painters, card writers, store front decorators; but they transformed the usually ugly small town store windows—making window dressing an art.

The school for developing this talent—a marvel to small towners in those days—was the open road. These clever window dressers and sign painters were graduated from the school of hard knocks.

They were versatile—their talents knew no bounds. From dressing a window masterfully to the tastes of those desiring silks and lingeries, they could pass on quickly to the window of farm tools, horse haberdashery, and clutters of kitchen hardware.

These old-time rapid-fire window trimmers, and store sign painters, saloon mirror decorators, were artists born, not made. Their highest possibilities were never reached; because they seldom worked that long. It was a hand-to-mouth existence. Work was a pleasure indulged in only from necessity.

They were advertising men who instinctively knew how to get the greatest publicity value out of the most unpromising space. And yet they played the game of art for art's sake in attracting trade.

Their job was beautifully and ingeniously to decorate those spots which had never before known the artistic touch of beauty. They made windows of junk appear in gala attire.

One of the most striking small town windows I ever saw was made by a Wandering Willie Artist.

The Elks were going to hold a convention. Jake hit town ahead of the celebration. He made a dozen or so window trims, and each an Elks window through and through, and all different.

In the center of one background was a beautiful Elk's head. The background was made of crepe paper in B. P. O. E. colors wound in spirals and artistically draped. From the horns of the Elk's head white and purple ribbons were extended to all the articles making up the display. All these colors produced a striking effect. On the window glass was painted a clock representing one of the Elks' emblems.

This window carried a special message of welcome to the visiting Elks.

All the windows in town were trimmed by this wandering artist especially for the event—and the Elks' symbols and colors were used in various ways to attract attention.

All the saloon mirrors were painted with beautiful scenes from African Jungles to Jersey Cows. In the center of each and every mirror, or painted window, were those masterful advertising words—"Welcome B. P. O. E."

This "Wandering Willie" artist worked night and day. He made the town shout a welcome. He made it look prosperous. He made a seersucker suit town put on a dress suit. That town was trimmed, adorned, and decorated to a Queen's taste. In gala attire she welcomed her guests with a glad hand. She smiled a smile of gladness. The store fronts and show windows had been under the skillful hands of a real artist. He was a true advertising artist. He came out of the unknown and he slipped quietly out of town after he was satisfied his town in gala attire had favorably impressed her visitors. His marvelous paintings on the barroom windows long remained to be admired, but he was soon forgotten—having left behind only the color mark of a genius.

Chapter XXXIII

An Odd Prize Coloring Contest

BACK in the 'nineties System Magazine published a series of articles under the title "Selling Campaigns That Have Won," written by myself. They described the unique contest schemes used to sell a new brand of old-fashioned sugar cookies.

One important illustration was that of the sampling scheme—a half page newspaper advertisement with its 5c coupon which sold 15,000 ten-cent boxes of sugar cookies in one day and set off the fireworks in a big campaign.

To keep up the interest after the sensational sampling stunt on "Sugar Cookie Day" $50 in prizes was offered for reading a series of advertisements and writing a letter about the sugar cookies, naming the five best arguments appearing in the advertisements.

The prize awards were based on the most original experience with Busy Bee Sugar Cookies, the best opinions as to the five best arguments for buying, and the neatness and cleverness of the letter.

The next step in this campaign was to run some clever contests to get the interest of school children at the same time.

While the ad reading contest was a success in reaching the general public it hit over the heads of the children. One of our oldest theories in the advertising game is that mothers are many times influenced to buy by the urging of children.

Two schemes were tied together. The purpose of one was to start the other. Twenty-five dollars in gold was offered to boys and girls for collecting the lids of the sugar cookie boxes. The largest number saved won the prize.

This sent the children scampering from neighbor's door to door, urging them to buy the sugar cookies so they could collect the lids.

IDEAL WEEKLY MUST HAVE VITALIZED NEWS AND STRONG EDITORIALS

More Illustrations Also Urged as Modernizing Step at 14th Annual Washington Newspaper Institute in Seattle Three Hundred Attend

THREE hundred newspaper men and women went to school on the University of Washington Campus at Seattle, Feb. 25, 26, 27, when the Fourteenth Annual Newspaper Institute was in session. The attendance bettered the record of last year by more than 100.

Each newspaper owner who attended the institute was presented with a free copy of "Newspaper Laws in Washington," compiled by E. L. Skeel, attorney for the Washington Press Association, and just published by that body.

The Institute opened officially with a smoker at the Faculty Men's Club on the university campus.

At luncheon Friday noon, Washington editors who take the United Press service gathered for a short conference with Reuel Moore of Portland, U. P. news manager for the Northwest.

At the mid-winter executive session of the Washington Press Association, held Friday night, with Fred L. Wolf, editor, Newport Miner, presiding, favorable action was taken on the Florida Press Foundation plan after a report by Fred L. Kennedy, field manager for the Association who attended the Florida conference recently.

A movement was begun to obtain legislation providing for taxation for the purposes of state publicity. If such legislation goes through, funds will be accumulated that will make it possible to take care of letters of inquiry that now come to the office of the Secretary of State asking the opportunities of Washington. During the past year 20,000 such letters went unanswered. The Executive Committee voted to continue the Washington Newspaper as the official organ of the Association and to use it as a more than self-supporting magazine by getting more advertising for it.

It was also voted to continue the work of Henry R. Ferris, traveling advertising representative of the Association. It was estimated that Mr. Ferris has been directly responsible for an increase during the last year of 30 per cent over former years in foreign advertising carried in Washington country papers.

Among the speakers on the program were L. D. Angevine, editor, Mount Vernon (Wash.) Argus, who discussed "The Market Value of Your Newspaper"; Fred Wiman, Western Engraving and Colortype Company, Seattle, who talked on "Illustrating the Country Newspaper"; J. M. Stoddard, editor, Waterville Empire Press, who told of "The Ideal County Weekly." The address of H. D. Campbell, editor of the Vancouver (Wash.) Evening Columbian, on premium circulation is printed elsewhere in this issue.

Concerning valuation of newspaper properties Mr. Angevine said:

"The market value of your newspaper is determined, in my opinion, first of all by the possibilities and present scope of its field, by the amount of advertising and commercial printing which it is capable of yielding.

"Second, by the reputation your newspaper and business enjoy in the community.

"Third by its present earnings.

"Fourth, by its physical equipment."

Mr. Wiman in his address commented upon the lack of illustrations in the country press as contrasted with the liberal use of pictures by large city papers which are going after country circulation. He urged weekly editors to adopt a definite budget for illustrations and attempt to print at least one good local cut each week.

"A better illustrated country press will make it easier for you to obtain any outside advertising you are after," he concluded. "You will be better enabled to compete on an equal basis with the circulation of the large dailies in your towns. Local pictures in your papers give you a decided advantage over the circulation of any other medium in your community."

The ideal country weekly will be a paper carrying vitalized news and a strong editorial page, J. M. Stoddard said in his talk. The problem of a perfect weekly resolves itself into the problem of a perfect editor, he stated. Greater editorial and mechanical efficiency, is needed, as well as better type styles and printing.

"The hope of our profession lies in the departments of journalism," he declared. "I think we are all agreed that the time is past, when you can take a cigar box, a corkscrew and a monkey wrench, and publish a newspaper that is acceptable among readers of our day."

Walter P. Burn, Pacific Coast manager of the Bureau of Advertising, American Newspaper Publishers' Association, scheduled to speak on "Selling Markets to Bring in Foreign Advertising" was unable to attend.

The meeting place for the 1926 summer session of the Association, which was to have been decided at the institute, will be left to a mail referendum. Spokane, Ellensburg, and Longview are bidding for the convention.

Resolutions were passed commending Dean M. Lyle Spencer of the University of Washington School of Journalism, who is resigning from the deanship, for his seven years activity and counsel. Dean Spencer has been made a life member of the Washington Press Association, the first time such a membership has been granted.

The principal entertainment feature was provided by the Pacific Coast Coal Company, which was host to the newspaper men at the noon luncheon on the university campus Saturday. Later the publishers were taken on a trip to the Newcastle coal mine. A banquet in the Spanish Ball Room of the Olympic Hotel closed the meeting.

Among the veteran newspaper men attending the Institute were Beriah Brown, editor, Coupeville Island County Times, who published the first daily newspaper in Seattle, and worked on the Seattle Post before it was absorbed by the Post-Intelligencer. The youngest newspaper men attending the Institute were Roy and Ray Craft and Robert Cooper, co-editors of the McCleary Stimulator, high school boys who are publishing a real community weekly.

Hoe Sales Staff Give Banquet to Member Who Resigned

Oscar C. Roesen, who resigned from R. Hoe & Co., printing press manufacturers, to take charge of the sales department of the Wood Newspaper Machinery Corporation on March 1, was guest of honor at a banquet given by associates of the former firm Feb. 27.

OSCAR C. ROESEN

Mr. Roesen had been with the Hoe concern for 14 years. He travelled extensively throughout the United States and is widely known among newspaper men.

Gilbert Higgins of the Hoe sales staff presided at the banquet, which was attended by more than 30 of Mr. Roesen's friends. Harry M. Tillinghast, secretary of the company, attended and paid tribute to the loyalty and brilliant work of Mr. Roesen.

Mr. Roesen, in a brief speech, thanked those who had honored him.

N. Y. POST REPORTERS BARE FUND PLOTS

International Narcotic Crusade Exposed As Giving Only 90 Cents on Every Dollar—Byers, Gould and Klein Win Praise

Directed by Vincent G. Byers, city editor, two reporters of the New York Evening Post began a series of stories Feb. 22, exposing peculiar practices in fund raising in New York. The reporters were Bruce Gould and Norman Klein.

The first story uncovered the fact that backers of a so-called International Narcotic Crusade, raising money for a hospital for drug addicts on Long Island, were keeping 90 cents out of every dollar for themselves. Five other fund raisers, showing irregularities, were subsequently exposed. More exposures are promised.

The tip came to Byers through an advertisement printed in the New York Times asking for solicitors. A tipster had answered the advertisement and had reached the conclusion shady practices were involved.

Gould was assigned to go to the address and apply for a position. He did and reported the outfit was rotten. Klein was sent to confirm Gould's story. The first story, ably written, followed. The international crusade stopped "crusading."

"The trio, Byers, Gould and Klein, have done a very good job," was the comment of Merritt Bond, managing editor.

Klein has been with the Evening Post since last September. Prior to that he was for two years with Lord & Thomas, an advertising agency, in the Chicago office. He has also been on the staffs of the Chicago Tribune, Chicago Daily News, Des Moines Register, Sioux City Tribune, Winnipeg Tribune, New York American, and United News. He was graduated from the University of Wisconsin.

Enlisting as a private soon after war was declared, Klein went overseas with the first 500 American troops. From the front he sent back signed mail stories to the Chicago Daily News.

Gould is an alumnus of the University of Iowa. He started newspaper work on the Des Moines Tribune, came to New York and, joining the United News, was sent to that press association's Boston bureau. He returned subsequently to New York and became a reporter for the New York Sun, where he spent two years before becoming associated with the Evening Post about a year and a half ago.

STAR-BEACON TO BUILD

Ohio Daily Plans New Home on Park Street—Much New Equipment

The Ashtabula (O.) Star-Beacon early this hpring will occupy a new home on Park Street, in the heart of Ashtabula's business district.

Established in 1888, the Star-Beacon until now has been without a home of its own, having always operated in leased quarters. Soon after the present owner, C. A. Rowley, former publisher of the Lorain (O.) Times-Herald, took over the paper he took steps toward the construction of a new plant.

The Star-Beacon's new building is the last word in modern newspaper plant construction. It is of steel, brick and concrete and strictly fireproof in all particulars. It is being erected at an approximate cost of $80,000, exclusive of equipment.

Much new equipment will go into the plant, including a new 24-page capacity Duplex Tubular press.

Mr. Rowley, in addition to the Star-Beacon, also publishes the Painesville (O.) Telegraph and the Geneva (O.) Free-Press, both daily papers.

DOMINION PAPERS HIT AT U. S. DAILIES

Ottawa Censor Bans N. Y. Mirror, and Payne, Managing Editor, Claims Toronto Star is Behind Order —Others Censored

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

Ottawa, March 4.—Canadian newspapers near the U. S. border are crusading against American publications, this week centering attacks on the tabloids.

A number of daily newspapers, some illustrated periodicals and many magazines which are published in the United States and which print stories and pictures that are considered obscene, from the Canadian censor's point of view, will be banned. This is the intimation that comes from semi-official source. The censor is now considering an order to exclude the New York Evening Graphic and the Detroit Times, having been specifically instructed to do so by the Minister of Customs, Hon. G. H. Boivin.

The censor banned the New York Daily Mirror, as the result of complaints received from women's organizations, service clubs and some editors, who alleged that the Mirror, has been publishing objectionable matter. In the case of Liberty, the specific complaint was the series of articles on the life of King Edward, which Canadian women considered were of seditious character.

"The Toronto Star has been waging an active campaign against the Mirror," Philip A. Payne, managing editor of that tabloid, said to EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "We started a pre-date edition in Toronto and ran up 22,000 circulation there, cutting into Star subscribers.

"We are negotiating with government officials in Ottawa now, and hope to have the ban lifted shortly."

"HAPHAZARD CENSORSHIP"

Ottawa Journal Condemns Customs Ban On American Papers

OTTAWA, Ont., March 3.—The Ottawa Journal, on its editorial page today, says:

"HAPHAZARD CENSORSHIP

"Our Customs Department is the subject of investigation, and, although we are assured that the surface has only been scratched, there is evidence of a nauseating mess. It is at such a time that the Customs Department takes it upon itself to censor our reading morals. A fortnight ago this department of government decided that we were too innocent and sweet-minded a people to read something which a magazine called Liberty printed about the late King Edward; now it has decided that a New York picture paper, the Daily Mirror, carries photographs of bathing and screen beauties showing more epidermis than is good for our eyes.

"As Lord Balfour said about the London Daily Mail, the New York Daily Mirror is one paper that we abstain from reading, consequently we cannot pronounce judicially upon the attire, or lack of it, of the young ladies in question.

"But surely if this country is going to have a censorship, if it needs an intellectual and moral dietician, the thing ought to be done in an intelligent sort of way. A censorship is a serious thing. What we have now is a regulation of our reading matter—by whom? By politicians, who, quite obviously, with their ears to the ground for votes, are influenced by every complaint that comes to them, whether well-based or not, and whose decision in one case at least was ridiculous.

"We wonder what the British people would do to a censorship like that?

"There may be much to be said in favor of an intelligent, discriminating supervision of certain reading matter coming into this country. That principle, few will combat. But to have a censorship by politicians who obviously and almost necessarily are unequipped to exercise it with proper knowledge and discrimination, is something that the public should not stand for."

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

Thinks in terms of economics and finance—C. A. HEBB

CLARENCE A. HEBB, the new managing editor of the Brooklyn Times, appointed to that position this week, succeeding the late Walter M. Oestreicher, is the man who started the bucket shop exposé in New York in 1922, which resulted in the closing of the Consolidated Stock Exchange and the enactment of new state laws for protecting the gullible.

Mr. Hebb was business editor of the Brooklyn Eagle when he started investigation of the bucket shops. It was taken up later first by the New York Herald and then followed by all other New York and Brooklyn papers.

Ever since he started newspaper work in 1903 on the Brooklyn Standard Union following his graduation from Cornell University where he specialized in English and economics, Mr. Hebb's chief interests have been finance and politics. His first assignment, in fact, happened to be a bank dinner in Brooklyn. Eight months ago, he was brought from the Eagle to the staff of the Times to organize a financial department for that newspaper. In a few weeks he had assembled his news services and organized a staff of tabulators of stock market prices, and the Brooklyn Times is now producing a daily stock table that has attracted attention among the city newspapers as one of the leaders of Wall Street editions in point of accuracy. There is keen rivalry among the evening papers in New York for accuracy in stock market prices that come off the presses in comparatively few minutes after the market closes.

"The slump in the stock market in the last few weeks has made a frequent front page feature of Wall street news," said Mr. Hebb in an interview this week. "The stock market has a greater news value than ever before because of the great increase of public interest in securities.

"This increasing public interest in economic news, in price movements, in stock market and real estate speculation has developed during the past five years. Not only were the people educated to investment in securities by the Liberty Loans during the war, but this country has entered an economic era in which labor of the hands is being displaced more and more every year by machinery and mechanical power resulting in creation of a larger number interested in investment and speculation. The movement has been intensified by restriction of our immigration, and the necessity of reducing production costs has mothered the invention of all manner of new mechanical process and applications of power.

"This has meant a high standard of wages, a high standard of living and higher education for the youth of the country. The universities are overcrowded. The schools are teaching economics and a political campaign—nationally at least—finds its public appeal in discussion of economic problems, whereas in the old days a spread eagle speech was the candidate's chief formula for getting the votes.

"Such a trend calls for the editor's attention to financial news. Profits and losses, whether in stocks or in real estate or in commodities are coming to have a wide public appeal.

"At the same time people have more time for recreation and entertainment—and they must be entertained, whether it be on Broadway, at home with the radio or around the corner at the movies. The evening paper is looked to for entertainment, and notwithstanding that old-time newspaper men complain that the modern newspaper is ceasing to be a newspaper, the tired business man and the family demand the features. I've seen one of the biggest and most serious minded business men in this city at work on a crossword puzzle all the way home on the train. I suppose it is for the same reason that the 'Follies' survive at the theater while Shakespeare closes after a short run. The management of a newspaper must have always in mind the particular field it wants to cover—the particular popular requirement it wishes to serve. Here in the Brooklyn Times we are building a home paper that is delivered direct to the homes by a highly organized system of carriers. My experience as financial editor, with letters arriving daily for information and advice on securities, suggests to me that there is interest among the home readers in financial and business news as well as in those features that appeal to the women and the children of the family.

"The proper mixture of the news and feature ingredients in a newspaper is a matter of unceasing experimentation, as the character of our newspapers shows. I don't expect that there will ever be found a formula that will be perfect, and with which, having found it, we can be satisfied."

The new managing editor is well known throughout Brooklyn, where he has spent nearly 23 years in newspaper work. When he came to the Brooklyn Times he had been for 16 years with the Brooklyn Eagle. In addition to being business editor, he was city editor of the Eagle for eight years. He began his career with the Brooklyn Standard Union in 1903, and after two years with that paper went to the Citizen, where he was engaged from 1905 to 1909.

Schwarz Joins Thompson Group

Julian J. Schwarz, until recently national advertising manager of the Birmingham (Ala.) News, has been named new contact man on national advertising for the Thompson Group of Alabama newspapers, including the Mobile News-Item, Mobile Register, Birmingham Age-Herald and Montgomery Journal. Mr. Schwarz plans to cover the eastern and western field along with the John M. also has many of the BIGGEST FACTORIES!

IOWA is known throughout the country as the center of the world's bread basket.

Iowa leads in corn production. The value of Iowa's corn every year is approximately equal to that of all Canada's wheat crop.

Iowa's annual apple crop is worth more than that of any of the Pacific or Mountain States.

Iowa's eggs are worth more than all the oranges raised in the United States.

But Iowa is also an important industrial state—far more important than most advertisers realize.

Iowa has the largest factory in the manufacture of each of the following products: Baskets, buttons, crackers and macaroni, butter, calendars, cereals, steel furnaces, stump pullers, wall-plaster, motor tractors, and washing machines.

This unusual combination of prosperous agriculture and industry makes Iowa one of the richest of all markets for the sale of both luxuries and necessities.

The quickest and most effective way to reach this market is through advertising in the daily Iowa newspapers!

UNITING "FRAGMENTS OF KNOWLEDGE" AIM OF MEDILL SCHOOL OF JOURNALISM

Professors Seek to Break Down Isolation of Ideas—Lectures Digested at Round Tables—Students Must Have Stories Accepted and Printed

CHARACTERISTIC lines of approach to course work in the Medill School of Journalism of Northwestern University are illustrated by two of its courses in Problems of Contemporary Thought and Newspaper Reporting. The course in Problems of Contemporary Thought is required of all senior journalism students for the degree and is elective in several other schools. As a "survey of science, society, art and philosophy and their relations to each other," it covers the whole field of thinking from four points of view: studies in matter, studies in social policy, studies in personal values and general conceptions of the world.

H. F. HARRINGTON

At other schools are courses of a like nature, the aim of which is to give students the Weltanschauung, or world-view, but Northwestern's course is unique in two ways. Most similar courses attempt to unify the fields of knowledge for the freshman on the threshold of his college life. Northwestern's, however, is a synthesis-after-the-fact; coming in his last year at college, it aims to co-ordinate the student's knowledge, and "to help him relate the fragments of his educational experience into an intelligible whole, and to break down in some measure the isolation of ideas and the watertight compartments of knowledge which result from the necessary specialization of college courses."

Its second point of difference is that it combines the expert testimony of many scholars and specialists, in lectures, with the continuous overlordship of a single personality, at round tables, where the rich food of the lectures can be digested.

Other courses with this synthetic bias have been either taught throughout by a single instructor (with inevitable gaps where his not-quite-omnisciency has sagged); or, taught by outstanding men in each field, but lacking the correlation and summing up of an academic generalissimo. Thus Northwestern's is a happy combination of the two great desiderata of such a course, authority and continuity.

The catalogue describes the course as follows:

Problems of Contemporary Thought: This course is designed to give the student a unified idea of the world in which he lives. A survey of the sciences, the problems of social action and the appreciative and spiritual interests of the individual will be made with an aim to coordinate the student's knowledge and help him to correlate the fragments of his educational experience in an intelligible whole.

Weekly lectures by authorities in natural science, biology, psychology, sociology, history, economics, arts and philosophy will be given progressively with a plan, not only to correlate these interests, but to suggest their tendencies of new growth and future changes. The lectures as a group are planned to present a survey of the field of modern thought. A weekly round table will be held by the instructor in charge to aid the student by his discussion and comment in the further synthesis of the material. . . .

Among the lecturers in the course are: Clarence Darrow, W. Lee Lewis, Forest R. Moulton, Arthur A. Kendall, Joseph Jastrow, W. D. MacMillan, Fay-Cooper Cole, Ferdinand Schevill, Edwin E. Slosson, Earl Dean Howard, Frederick S. Deibler, William L. Bailey, E. A. Ross, Jane Addams, Charles E. Merriam, Robert Morss Lovett, Llewellyn Jones, Zona Gale, Karleton Hackett, Baker Brownell, Shailer Mathews, Delton T. Howard, Addison W. Moore, Bertrand Russell.

Both Bertrand Russell and John Dewey have commended the course, the planning of which was done by Baker Brownell, professor of Contemporary Thought at Northwestern University. Professor Brownell, who is engaged on a book covering the field of the course and organized on the plan of the lectures, is in charge of the round-tables and of the course as a whole.

Professor E. A. Ross has said of this course that it is inevitable and that something like it will in time penetrate even the remoter college fastnesses.

For another method of class procedure examine the class in Reporting and Editing. In this course, H. F. Harrington, director of the school, serves as managing editor for the reporters, while John C. Carroll, copyreader for the Chicago Tribune, heads the copy desk in the editing division. The course endeavors to combine the functions of securing, writing and handling news into a single unified process terminating in publication, and does not end as most reporting classes with the writing of news, but carries the process to completion by actual editing and publication.

In the laboratory classroom periods students bend to their typewriters under the eye of the managing editor or write heads and revise copy under instructions from Mr. Carroll, who sits in the slot. The aim of the class is education through absorption and association. While the student is still in the classroom he has opportunity to check on his own work and to benefit by suggestions from the instructor and members of the class.

Classroom procedure is supplemented by actual assignments in the covering, writing and editing of news for the Daily Northwestern and the Chicago Evening Post. The course is not completed until the student has had a liberal assortment of stories accepted and printed.

In the senior year these same reporters are given the range of assignments in Chicago as members of a metropolitan newspaper staff one day a week much as in the Journalism 43 class at Columbia.

This is the tenth of a series of articles obtained by EDITOR AND PUBLISHER to interpret the Schools of Journalism to the editors of the nation.

SUN ATTACKS SEITZ

Bitter Editorial Follows Former World Man's Thrust at Late Publisher

The following astonishing editorial appeared in the New York Sun of last Saturday, Feb. 27, under the caption, "Mr. Munsey and Don C. Seitz—A Contrast":

"We quote below, from the news columns of the New York Times, part of an attack made last Wednesday evening by Don C. Seitz, former business manager of the World, on the late Frank A. Munsey:

" 'Having failed to make any newspaper go, and being met with contumely on the part of all professional journalists, who regarded him as a "butter-in," Munsey said to himself, "Well, if I can't make I will destroy," so he took paper after paper and scrapped them.'

"Such a statement might be overlooked if it came from a man unacquainted with the history and character of Mr. Munsey. But there is no escape for Mr. Seitz on that score.

"Mr. Seitz knew Mr. Munsey for many years. He knew him so well that on May 4, 1914, he induced Mr. Munsey to make him a loan of $25,000, promising to repay in three months. The note was extended again and again, and Mr. Seitz's letters, full of gratitude for these frequent accommodations, betrayed none of the 'contumely' in which Mr. Seitz now suggests that he, as a 'professional journalist,' must have held the man who was doing him a favor.

"In September, 1924, soon after his return from a vacation in Europe, Mr. Munsey learned that Don C. Seitz had recently met with misfortunes. Discovering that Mr. Seitz still owed him, on various notes, $3,504 of the loan of ten years before, Mr. Munsey sent for him and told him that he wished to make the slate clean. To this end Mr. Munsey charged off his books all of the $3,504 that Mr. Seitz owed him.

"So it is in a way true, as Mr. Seitz declared in his speech this week, that Mr. Munsey was a 'destroyer.' He destroyed Mr. Seitz's unpaid notes. He 'took paper after paper'—Mr. Seitz's promissory paper—'and scrapped them.'

"And Mr. Munsey died in the happy but mistaken belief that Mr. Seitz was a friend worthy of his generosity."

EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week brought the editorial to the attention of Mr. Seitz who, through his secretary, said that he had no comment to make.

If it Pertains to the Office it Belongs in the Times-Star

Who buys the adding machines, typewriters, stationery, filing equipment, fireproof safes, desks, chairs, waste baskets, ink, pencils and erasers for your office? The purchasing agent buys some of them, but the clerks who are to use them exercise a compelling influence over the specifications. The auditors, the bookkeepers and the file clerks can make a success or a failure of any piece of office equipment if they are not properly sold on its merits. A single sentence from a trusted stenographer can often undo all the effect of a salesman's argument.

In Cincinnati the Times-Star alone reaches all the individuals who are concerned with the purchase of office equipment. Comparatively few of them read the morning newspapers at all. Only those directly responsible for the buying read the trade papers. But all of them habitually look to the Times-Star for guidance in making their personal purchases and the purchases of equipment for their homes. The habit holds. The influence persists.

No wonder, then, that the manufacturers who make office appliances and the merchants who sell them should place practically twice as much display advertising in the Times-Star as they place in both Cincinnati morning newspapers combined!

When You Come West--to Oakland, California During This Year of 1926——

You will be impressed as you see that Oakland, California, and trading area, is apparently the center of Western prosperity and advancement.

1925 Bank Clearings approximately.....$1,075,000,000.00
1925 Savings Deposits approximately..... 105,000,000.00
Population.....550,000

As you see that, geographically, Oakland, California, and trading area, has all the required natural advantages for future advancement.

Terminus for three transcontinental railways, and docking facilities for shipping from all over the world.

And as you see the results of the past year's building activities—beautiful homes and downtown office structures.

1925 Building Permits approximately $50,000,000.

And as you see the 27 miles of waterfront and extensive shipping activities.

A $9,960,000 waterfront improvement bond issue has just been approved by a large majority of the voters.

And as you see the many large and well equipped factories operating full time all the year.

Total estimated yearly factory output, $500,000,000.

And as you see the happy well-paid workers going to and returning from their employment.

177,803 male buyers—159,891 female buyers in Oakland, California and the Eastbay area.

And as you see the miles of well-paved streets, lined with well-kept homes, or, as in the business district, with busy stores and banking institutions.

113,326 families in Oakland, California, and trading area, to be supplied with every-day needs and many luxuries.

And as you see the prosperous back country, through which concrete highways radiate in all directions.

90,000 automobiles in Oakland, California, and trading area.

And as you note that 42% of the families own their homes, and that practically every resident enjoys, in addition to his other luxuries, his radio equipment.

27,500 Radio Receiving Sets conservatively estimated as operating in the Eastbay community.

Then will you more fully realize that Oakland, California, and trading area, is a market to be seriously reckoned with when considering Pacific Coast advertising and consumer distribution.

Then will you realize that Oakland, California, and trading area, is a community swayed by no outside influence, but that this community is dependent upon its own industries and business institutions for success and support.

Then will you realize that the OAKLAND TRIBUNE (70,000 circulation, net paid, daily and Sunday) is essential for the complete success of any advertising and distribution plan that involves the San Francisco Bay area.

EDITORS OF ECUADOR SUFFER PRISON AND EXILE FOR PRESS FREEDOM

Returning Now to Native Land After Banishment Under Provisional Military Rule for Demanding to Print News

GUAYAQUIL, Ecuador, Feb. 12.—Newspaper editors and managers are returning to Ecuador, following the fall of the military provisional directorate government which exiled or imprisoned them last December for refusal to obey censorship regulations. The story is an interesting chapter in the annals of fighting for press freedom and is related by E. Alvarez-Lara, manager and managing editor of El Guante of this city, who was both imprisoned and exiled, as follows:

"On July 9, 1925, the garrisons of Guayaquil and Quito, backed by the balance of the Ecuadorian army, deposed the constitutional government and established instead a board of provisional government, formed by six civilians and one general, appointed by the army and navy and controlled by the boards of officers.

"The next morning our editor was notified by a lieutenant that the board of officers of Guayaquil had decided to establish a censorship on our paper. The editor in charge, Rosendo Aviles, refused to accept it and declared that the paper would rather cease publication. He pointed out also that the proclamation of the military forces, the day before, had recognized the citizens' right to press liberty, among other liberties. The lieutenant answered that the army would not insist upon enforcing censorship if we did not accept it.

"Despite that assurance, from that date to the end of October, the dailies of this city and other towns of Ecuador had frequent unimportant trouble with military and civil authorities.

"All newspapers of Guayaquil were against a proposed enactment creating a national reserve bank, which, by the people of the coastal region was considered a direct attack against the wealth of the coast, the richest zone of the country. That was the main source of trouble, because the army, formed largely by highlanders, insisted that the press should support the bank project.

"On Oct. 30, a mass-meeting of bankers, merchants, industrialists, labor leaders, farmers, etc., after a long discussion of the project, voted against establishment of the bank. This meeting adjourned about eight o'clock in the evening and 20 minutes later we received a letter from the governor of the city, prohibiting the publication of any information about the meeting. This order was based upon a decree of the day before issued by the board of provisional government at Quito, providing a penalty of fine, prison and exile for any one who directly or indirectly opposed the establishment of the reserve bank.

"I was notified at my home by my assistant, and when I sought out Manuel Eduardo Castillo, editor of El Telegrafo, I found that he was already on his way to my office. A meeting that evening between representatives of El Telegrafo, El Guante, El Universo, La Opinion Publica, El Heraldo, La Prensa, La Idea, and El Intransigente reached a decision to publish the prohibited matter with the same text and headings in all papers and to announce to the public that until the government guaranteed the freedom of the press, all papers would cease publication. The editions of Oct. 31, carried this information.

"That evening, when representatives of all the papers and a number of other people were assembled in our office, the chief of police, one of the revolutionary officers and a prominent member of the board of military officers of the province arrived. The last-named officer offered every guarantee in his own name and in behalf of the chief of the board of officers at Quito, and asked for publication of all papers the next day.

"The assembly of journalists accepted the guarantees, but refused to publish the dailies on Nov. 1, because no preparations had been made to publish, and we offered to renew publication on Nov. 2. The military delegate accepted. After he retired, the meeting decided to publish on Nov. 2, a joint edition eight-page paper, one page devoted to each of the papers, daily and weekly.

"As the boards of officers at Quito and Guayaquil were struggling for supremacy, events developed so that on Nov. 21, the board of Guayaquil was dissolved and its chairman, Comandante Mendoza, exiled.

"On Dec. 22, the editor of El Guante, Eleodoro Aviles-Minuche, was imprisoned, together with Pompilio Ulloa, owner and editor of La Prensa, and several other persons. The same evening Dr. Alfredo Gomez-Diaz, assistant editor, and Dr. Antonio Vanegas Martinez, subeditor of El Guante, were imprisoned. On Dec. 25, Mr. Aviles and I were put behind bars. Later all five of us and many others were exiled.

"On Jan. 10, 1926, the board of provisional government at Quito failed and was replaced by another board, appointed also by the military forces.

"A decree was issued permitting the return of all exiled."

Bimba Appeals Sedition Conviction

Anthony Bimba, editor of Freedom, published in Brooklyn, N. Y., was found not guilty of a blasphemy charge brought under a 229 year old Massachusetts statute in Brockton district court this week. He was found guilty, however, on a charge of sedition and fined $100. He appealed and was released on $500 bonds. The case will go to a higher court. Bimba was arrested on the above charges following a Brockton meeting he addressed a few weeks ago when he is alleged to have denied belief in God and urged overthrow of government.

PUEBLO AD MAN HEADS ELEVENTH DISTRICT

H. C. Whipple Named Chairman at Annual Meet—Woodbridge Says Associated Clubs a Force for World Peace

World advertising clubs hold the key to international peace, C. K. Woodbridge, national president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, and president of the Dictaphone Company of New York, told 200 advertising men and women gathered in the fourth annual conference of Eleventh district Associated Advertising Clubs at Pueblo, Col., Feb. 23 and 24. The conference embraced the states of Colorado, Wyoming, Idaho, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona and Nevada.

"Advertising clubs of the world can do more to insure world peace than all the politicians," Woodbridge declared. "The spirit of give-and-take and of helpful co-operation which is being fostered by ad clubs the world over is a healthy one. Not that ad clubs are peace clubs but that they are factors in international business and, as such, have an acute influence on international relationships."

"The great human market with which advertising men deal has the collective mentality of the average 13-year-old child," Reginald Colley, New York City, field secretary for the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, said.

"Financial advertising is not only necessary to the modern financial house but still more vitally necessary to the public," Henry Swan, vice-president of the United States National bank of Denver, said in discussing bank advertising.

"Advertising was ethically forbidden to the old-style bank, but today, next to the retail merchants, the bankers and bond houses of New York are that city's heaviest advertisers. Financial advertising is needed because the public lacks competent knowledge of banking; because the public loses many hundreds of thousands annually through unsafe investments and unwise family financing. It is the responsibility of financial advertising to create sound financial habits for the nation."

Opening address of welcome to the convention was given by Frank S. Hoag, publisher of the Pueblo Star-Journal. Sessions were presided over by F. E. J. Ronsholdt, Boulder, Colo., district chairman; A. Boon McCall, president of the Denver Ad Club and W. G. Sutherland, president of the Boulder Ad Club.

Officers elected include H. C. Whipple, president of the Pueblo Ad Club and a Pueblo automobile dealer, chairman; G. A. Hathaway of the J. F. Lockhart Company, Denver, first vice-president; E. M. Ledward, Denver, second vice-president and W. G. Sutherland, president of the Boulder club, secretary-treasurer.

A social feature of the convention was the staging by the Pueblo Ad Club of a "Days of 49" celebration.

Legion Still Fighting Editor

Spurred on by the American Legion, Attorney General Oscar Carlstrom of Illinois presented a motion before Judge Emanuel Eller in Criminal Court, Chicago, to expunge a writ of habeas corpus on which Arthur Lorenz, former editor of the Chicago Staats Zeitung, was released from a jail sentence of six months for libeling the legion. When the motion was denied, the attorney general announced he would ask the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to compel the Criminal Court judge to expunge the habeas corpus writ.

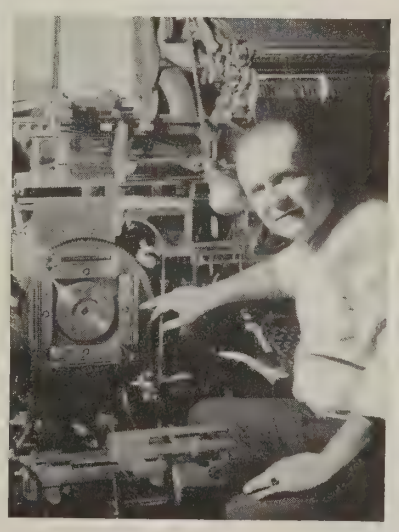
CHANGE from body matter to agate? Sure! Takes about a second. Just lift this lever. It's as light as a feather—the magazines are counterbalanced.

NOW FOR SOME HEADS! They're in the two auxiliary magazines. A touch on this button makes the shift. Same keyboard operates the auxiliaries.

THESE TWO AUXILIARY MAGAZINES are mighty handy. Wide enough to set good-sized heads. And interchangeable with the other Linotypes, too.

CORRECTIONS is it you want? You can have them in a jiffy. We don't even have to wait for the other mats to distribute. Here you are!



THE BOSS WANTS me to set some ads, so I'm changing all the magazines. That won't take long because they lift right off from the front.

HERE'S THE WAY we keep our type faces, in interchangeable magazines. Any magazine goes on any Linotype. They are easier to handle than type cases.

NOW FOR THE ADS. Bold face for the side heads in one main magazine. Roman and Italic body matter in the other. Display type in the auxiliaries.

OH YES! Of course there is the water-cooled mold disk, the universal knife block, and the universal ejector—they're on all Linotypes.

NOTABLES ATTEND GRADUATION OF 12 FROM EMPIRE PRINTING SCHOOL

INCREASED interest of New York State publishers and printers in the Empire State Printing School was reflected in several addresses which were given at the seventh semi-annual commencement exercises of the school held in Ithaca Saturday, Feb. 27. Twelve students were awarded diplomas, 11 men and one woman, bringing the total number of graduates to 120.

Among those who gave the school and its director, Ross W. Kellogg, high praise, were Frank E. Gannett, president of the New York State Publishers Association, and of the Gannett Newspapers; Charles F. Hart, mechanical superintendent of the New York Times; Victor F. Ridder, of the New York Staats-Zeitung and chairman of the committee on printing trades schools of the American Newspapers Publishers Association; John R. Rogers, consulting engineer of the Mergenthaler Linotype Company, and Jerome D. Barnum, publisher of the Syracuse Post-Standard.

Others who gave impromptu talks along the same lines included L. E. Owens, production manager New York World; Edwin G. Martin, business manager of the Brooklyn Eagle; and John W. Barnhart, business manager, New York Daily News. Others attending from New York were Lester L. Jones of the New York Publishers' Association and T. P. Seymour of the A. N. P. A.

In the absence of John W. Baker, chairman of the committee on education of the New York State Publishers Association, the president, Frank E. Gannett presided, and conveyed greetings from the publishers' association. He declared the printing school the most significant thing New York State publishers have undertaken, and attributed the major portion of its success to the director, Ross W. Kellogg.

Mr. Gannett assured the director and his students that the publishers have a great deal of faith in the school, without realizing any immediate benefit from its work, since the graduates must serve a period of apprenticeship before being admitted to the typographical union. The amount of their faith, he said, is evinced in their contributions of thus far, of about $100,000 to the school.

"We believe that union restrictions are too severe, in keeping out young men," asserted Mr. Gannett. "There are more printers dying today than are being created, and there are obviously fewer printers in New York State today than there were 10 years ago."

In his words of advice to the graduating printers, Mr. Gannett referred to the possibilities of education which the profession offers in itself, developing the most intelligent workmen in the country.

John R. Rogers emphasized the importance of printing as "the art preservative of all arts."

"Preserve your individuality when you enter the shops of your profession," was the advice which Jerome D. Barnum, vice-president of the New York State Publishers Association, gave the young printers. Too many men, he said, get into groups and are content to go with them. In his praise of the school, he referred to the prospect of a college of printing to replace the present small school.

Charles F. Hart of the New York Times, speaking on the "Problems o Production," summed up these problem as four—the boss, the men, machinery and material. Victor F. Ridder empha sized the importance of putting idealism above materialism in the printing profes sion.

PAST DECADE SAW RISE OF WEEKLIES TO GREAT INFLUENCE IN AGRICULTURE

Farm News, Virtually Neglected Ten Years Ago, Now Backbone of Many Papers—Advertisers Recognizing the Change

By W. P. KIRKWOOD

THE country weekly newspaper, still the subject of not infrequent humorous or caustic paragraphs, has in the last decade or decade and a half risen to a position which demands more serious recognition. It has, in fact, become an important economic factor in the life of the nation, and it has not yet attained its full growth as such a factor. It has attained this position through its effectiveness in aiding the cause of a sounder agriculture and a more attractive rural life, a cause in which the federal government and the state governments are spending many millions annually.

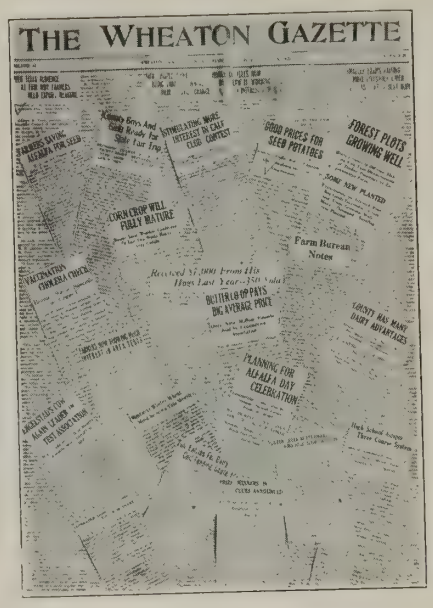
Because of the high service it has given to this cause, the country weekly has come, or at least is coming to take a definitely recognized place as a force of first rank in agriculture. The farmer himself is looking to it as a source of authoritative information, is counting on it as a medium through which to voice his position in relation to rural problems, and is using it increasingly for the advertising of his products. Industrial, financial, and commercial institutions are finding in it, likewise, an effective agency by which to promote their activities.



The change has come about through a shift of policy on the part of the country press itself.

Less than ten years ago, F. W. Beckman, head of the department of technical journalism at Iowa State College, made an analysis of the news of four typical issues of country weekly newspapers in Iowa, and found that these papers, typical of the time and the region, were practically ignoring the intimate interests of at least 50 per cent of their readers and the industry on which the welfare of both town and country had to be built. Some weeklies surveyed carried as low as two inches of farm news. Other surveys showed that the conditions in Iowa were the rule also in Minnesota and Kansas.

In the past ten years, however, four fairly distinct types of farm pages or departments have developed.

Perhaps the most common of these at present is that which contains market reports, government estimates of crop conditions and forecasts of prices, and instructive material supplied by agricultural colleges and experiment stations, and by the United States Department of Agriculture. An excellent example of this kind of page is that of one of the September, 1925, issues of the New Richland (Minn.) Star, headed "Farm and Dairy News" in the reproduction of typical country weekly farm departments herewith. The farm page referred to contained a federal government forecast of winter wheat production for 1926; cattle market quotations; a story of the closing out of the Minnesota co-operative wheat pool; a statement from the state agricultural experiment station, reminding farmers that the time for selecting seed corn for planting in 1926 had arrived; an item from the same source as to the best time for winter grain seeding in Minnesota; an announcement of the date chosen for the annual boys' and girls' livestock show of the state; a brief article about the trench silo as an inexpensive temporary substitute for the customary tank silo; a short item about sweet clover as a pasture crop—particularly timely, because a long drouth had dried up other pastures, and, in connection with a "campaign" to promote the poultry industry of the state, a statement from agricultural extension workers as to the value of a good poultry house.

A second type of farm page puts the emphasis on local farm news. The pioneer in this field—in the northwest, at least—is the Long Prairie Leader, published in the county seat of Todd county in a fine dairy region of north central Minnesota. The Leader employs as its farm page editor a successful farmer of long experience and residence in the county, provides him with a small motor car, and keeps him in the field through most of the year, gathering farm news. Here he will pick up an item about a farmer who carries as a "side line" a flock of purebred White Leghorn hens. There he will find a farmer interested in developing a fine fruit garden. At another place he will interview a farmer who is extending his alfalfa acreage. Out of each of these he makes a story, a story that is not only interesting because it tells of the activities of a neighbor, but valuable because it describes modern methods and practices. This is agricultural instruction with the "human interest" element added.

The Owatonna Journal-Chronicle, published in Steele county, one of the richest dairy counties in southeastern Minnesota, is working out a variation of the Long Prairie Leader's plan. A glimpse of its farm page is also shown in the accompanying reproduction. The Journal-Chronicle prints the same kind of material but it is gathered, not by a farmer editor, but by the editor himself and by his staff of country correspondents.

A very different kind of department, yet one which is effective, is in favor among papers of more limited field and circulation. Such papers make use of "ready prints," pages printed in large centers and shipped to local publishers to supplement home-printed pages, thereby reducing the amount of home-office type-setting and press work. The farm departments of these papers are supplied in their ready prints. They are made up of material supplied by colleges of agriculture or the United State Department of Agriculture. Between one-fourth and one-third of the country weeklies in Minnesota, use this kind of a department.

Local agriculture is not neglected by papers which publish features of this kind. That is cared for, and generously, in the home-print pages.

The fourth kind of department is a weekly news letter prepared by the county agricultural agent. These letters are from less than a column to three or four columns in length.

But the country weeklies do not limit the printing of agricultural and rural news to their farm pages or farm depatments. They "play up" farm and rural news under display heads on their front page and throughout their papers. This is seen in a collection of farm news stories, taken from one week's issues of a small number of papers in a western state, in a second reproduction with this article. It will be noticed that the four main heads on the first page of the Wheaton Gazette, which makes a background for the other items all have to do with agriculture.

That the influence of this emphasis on things agricultural by the country press is positive and large cannot be doubted.

The facts presented above indicate that the country weeklies, with their new devotion to the cause of a better agriculture and a soundly wholesome rural life, have become a real power in agriculture. Facts indeed point to still greater things for the country weekly, to a time of even more influence than it exerts today.

from which all printing plates are cast. Wet mats and steam tables are no longer used.

The METROPOLITAN DRY MAT is the only one (of U.S.A. or foreign make) that is altogether satisfactory in the metropolitan newspaper plant. Other makes of dry mats are limited as to the number of plates that may be cast from them; they cannot be molded to proper depth and in consequence must be backed-up in the most minute blanks, which operation in itself consumes more time than does the drying of wet mats under steam tables.

With the speediest and most efficient printing press ever built, an Autoplate output of 30 printing plates every minute of operation, and an avalanche of perfect molds now produced by METROPOLITAN DRY MATS The Inquirer has attained perfection in the science of newspaper manufacture.

"Uncle Oofty-Goofty" Sees First Fight

The Writer of the "Uncle Oofty-Goofty Bedtime Stories for Kiddies" Is Pressed Into Service to Cover a Boxing Contest When the Sporting Editor Fails to Show Up

By CHET JOHNSON

OH, there were just hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of Queer People there when Uncle Oofty-Goofty arrived.

The way they Shouted just made his Ears Ring. And they were so Excited! Uncle Oofty-Goofty trembled at the way they Argued about who would Win the Big Fight. Once (although you may find this Difficult to Believe, my Dear Readers) one of these very Noisy Men became very, very Angry with another Noisy Man (Fans, they call them) and they Sprang from their Seats and jumped right at Each Other! Then two Great Big Policemen, with Big, Shiny Stars walked up and told the Noisy Men that if they did not Sit Down and behave they would be Locked Up all alone in a Dark, Old Jail!

You should have seen how Nicely they Behaved after That! And you would Behave, too, if a Great, Big Policeman told you that Something you were Saying or Doing was Naughty, wouldn't you? Of course You Would.

How Puzzled and Amused Uncle Oofty-Goofty was by these Strange People, who just became more and more and more Excited every Minute.

At last a Funny Fatty Roly-Poly man with no Hair on His Little Round Head stood up and said: "Ladies and gentlemen: Next is the Main Event!" although the Noise was so Great that Nobody could understand what he said.

Then everybody just cheered and cheered, oh, so loud, when a Man in the Greeny-Greeniest and Wooly-Wooliest robe Crawled under the ropes.

"Battling McGiffy!" shouted the Funny Fatty Roly-Poly man with no Hair on his Little Round Head. And then another Man in the Purply-Urpliest robe you ever saw Climbed into the Ring and the Funny Fatty Roly-Poly man with no Hair on His Little Round Head said: "Soakum Gazotzky," and the Queer People cheered even louder.

Other men wearing Big Sweaters (although really, Little Readers, it was very, very Warm in There) crowded around, talking, looking into Buckets, Punching at Strange Nothings in the Air, picking up and putting down Big, Bouncy-Wouncy Gloves and waving Fuzzy-Wuzzy Towels.

Just as Uncle Oofty-Goofty was wondering what would Happen Next, a big Ding-Dong Bell went "Clang!"—just like that—"Clang!" and Battling McGiffy and Soakum Gazotzky (Uncle Oofty-Goofty thought he never had Heard such Funny Names) walked toward Each Other and tried to Shake Hands with those Big, Bouncy-Wouncy Gloves. How you would have Laughed had you been There, Little Dears, for of course they Could Not Shake Hands at All!

The hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of Queer People who were silent for Several Seconds (Uncle Oofty-Goofty wondered if the Cat had got Their Tongues) after the bell went "Clang!"—just like that—"Clang!" began to Shout the Strangest Words:

"Paste him, McGiffy!"

"Oh you Gazotzky!"

"Mop up the Floor with Him!"

Suddenly Mr. McGiffy became very, very much Put Out and he struck Mr. Gazotzky on his Pudgy-Wudgy Old Nose with one of the Big, Bouncy-Wouncy Gloves, And Mr. Gazotzky was so Surprished that he said, "Oof!"—just like that—"Oof!" and fell Right Down on the Floor as his Knocky-Ocky Obbly-Wobbly Knees gave way. He stood up after the Ruffy-wuffy Referee counted one—two—three.

Then Mr. Gazotzky—for it was his turn Next, you see—hit Mr. McGiffy oh, so hard, right in his Rummy-Ummy Old Tummy and Mr. McGiffy said "Ug!"—just like that—"Ug!" and swayed a Lot but did not Fall.

Instead, he hit Mr. Gazotzky so hard that he Began to Look Frightened, and the Queer People, who were Shouting and Pounding Uncle Oofty-Goofty on the back, shouted:

"Put him out!" "Finish him!" and "Don't let him suffer!"

Mr. Gazotzky moved one Arm and the Bouncy-Wouncy Glove just missed Mr. McGiffy's Flappy-Wappy Old Left Ear, then he moved the Other Arm and almost Hit Mr. McGiffy's Pudgy-Wudgy Nose and then he moved Both Arms and, really Little Dears, he didn't almost hit Anything!

Everybody laughed, and even Mr. McGiffy forgot he had been Put Out for he said:

"You're tired, Bo. Go to Sleep. I'll help You!

Then he Struck Mr. Gazotzky right under his Saggy-Waggy Jaw and Mr. Gazotzky went Sailing into the Air just like he was on a Magic Carpet, turned the cutest Flippity-Flop you ever saw and Fell on his Funny-Wunny Face! As he Landed, somebody Tossed in beside him a Fuzzy-Wuzzy Towel, but the Ruffy-Wuffy Referee went right on Counting up to Ten without Missing a number (how many of you can Count to Ten without Stopping?)

Then Uncle Oofty-Goofty knew that the Sandman had thrown some of His Sleepy-Eepiest Sand in Mr. Gazotzky's eyes and that he was With the Fairies, Listening to the Birdies Sing.

NEW A. P. A. EDITOR

A. A. Hoopingarner Succeeds E. P. Howard, Resigned

Arthur A. Hoopingarner, owner and editor of the Dover (O.) Daily Reporter and the New Philadelphia (O.) Advocate-Tribune, weekly, became editor of the American Press, New York, March 1, succeeding Edward Percy Howard, resigned to join the Fox Film Corporation.

Mr. Hoopingarner has had fifteen years' experience in newspaper work, starting in Dover, where he was born and educated. Later he was on the staff of the Chicago Tribune, and served as city editor of the Cleveland (O.) Press. After several years in Toledo and Columbus, Ohio, he went to Omaha, Neb., where he was managing editor of the Daily News until 1920, when he returned to Dover and purchased the Reporter, upon which he had his first newspaper experience.

Pitkin Findlay Courier Editor

Dwight L. Pitkin, formerly of the news staffs of the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune and the Chicago Tribune, has become editor of the Findlay (O.) Daily Courier. The Courier was recently bought by R. L. and L. N. Heminger, editor and manager of the Findlay Morning Republican. Consolidation of the two plants will take place within the next month. The Republican is going out of the job printing business and the room left vacant thus will be utilized by the Courier.

The Great Feature of the Century

TO THE NORTH POLE!

By Airplane

The Byrd All-America Expedition

Commander Richard E. Byrd, U. S. N., on leave, who commanded the Navy fliers in the Arctic last summer, will fly from Spitzbergen to the northernmost point of land in the world, a promontory in Greenland.

Here he will establish a base and return to Spitzbergen for further fuel and supplies.

He will then return to his Greenland base and fly to the Pole, then either to Spitzbergen direct or via Greenland as circumstances dictate.

(This feature is offered by arrangement with the New York Times and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.)

By Dirigible

The Amundsen and Ellsworth Expedition

Roald Amundsen, the famous Norwegian explorer, and Lincoln Ellsworth, who accompanied Amundsen on his dash for the Pole last summer, will attempt the first polar flight in a lighter-than-air-ship.

An Italian army dirigible secured in Rome will fly across Europe to a mast in Spitzbergen where Amundsen and Ellsworth will begin their 2000-mile journey across the Pole and the unexplored region to Port Barrow, Alaska.

(Offered by arrangement with the New York Times.)

By Auto-Sledge

The French Polar Expedition

Reserve Lieutenant Georges Darcis and Guy Debayser, both with brilliant records in the French army, accompanied by two scientists and an artist, will explore the polar regions in auto-sledges.

From a base at the edge of the ice-pack they will push their way with their tractor-like sledges to the Pole studying the surroundings and returning by way of Alaska or to their base.

They will carry two hydroplanes, fuel and supplies and equipment for scientific study.

(Offered by arrangement with the New York Times and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.)

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

UNTRUTHFUL ADVERTISING DESTROYS ITSELF

"ADVERTISING as practiced in the United States is essentially truthful. Untruthful advertising is virtually a thing of the past because it is a oomerang which destroys the untruthful advertiser. The modern public pos-sses too many sources of knowledge to be 'bunked' by untruthful advertising. Consequently the untruthful advertiser has been almost driven from the field."—. K. Woodbridge, president, Associated Advertising Clubs of the World.

AIDING THE SCHOOLS

"WE would like the press to tell us: Can the universities do anything that will help to bring our work, our needs, our contributions to civilization, me to the people and to the public in a better way than we have ever done? an we do anything that will enable the newspapers sympathetically to tell e story of our needs and of our work, and to endorse us? If we are failing some vital point, tell us about it!"—James H. Kirkland, Chancellor, Van-rbilt University.

THE NEWSPAPER'S FUNCTION

"MUCH of the criticism of newspapers is based upon the ignorance of the public as to what a newspaper is meant to be. A newspaper, contrary common opinion, is not meant to be a record of the day's events. It is meant be a record of UNUSUAL events. The modern newspaper grows out of e herald of old. No herald of old ever lashed his horse to foam to bring to waiting multitude the news of a commonplace."—Grove Patterson, Editor, oledo Blade.

TEACHERS OF LIFE

"THE ambition of an editor worth his salt is to serve and to lead. . . . He must help every man and woman in his district to get the utmost of life. He is interested in the store, the shop, the factory, the laborer; the doctor, the lawyer, the spiritual leader; in the parlor, the kitchen, the k-cellar. Sometimes he will be wrong; but always he is honest. Often he st go against the popular clamor; for he is a leader, not a trimmer; a teacher life, not an idler in the market-place. It is a wonderful career despite its dships."—Rev. John Danihy, Dean, Marquette University College of Jour-ism, to Wisconsin Press Association.

OPPORTUNITIES IN JOURNALISM

"EVERY one of the executives of the New York Sun, including the pub-lisher, the editor, the managing editor, circulation manager and adver-ng manager worked themselves up through the ranks of various newspapers heir present positions, and this, I think you will find, holds true in the execu-positions of any daily newspaper. They are men who started at the bottom a the determination to make newspaper work their life work. The young n who enters a newspaper office must come in as a private and work himself through rank and file until he gets to the position he hopes for or is qualified lling. His remuneration and position will increase according to merited pro-ion."—Edwin S. Friendly, Business Manager, New York Sun.

NEW JERSEY ATROCITY

HAVE you ever seen a burly cop hit over the head or back with a hickory club a defenseless, innocent, law-abiding, pathetically earnest woman strike picket?

Unless you have witnessed this spectacle the news from Passaic, N. J., will be hard to understand. If you have witnessed it, and experienced reporters are familiar with such official terrorism, you know: (1) That the brutal Cossack outrage is to drive that woman back to work in a mill on her employer's terms. (2) That the same club will knock the block off any newspaper man who comes into "our town" to tell the truth of the bloody business.

Passaic's story is told, the pictures have been printed! It is not yet possible for a gang of uniformed thugs and hired gangsters to abuse human beings worse than dogs and conceal the infamy by gagging the press! Constitutional rights are still guaranteed. The freedom of the American newspaper is not so easily clubbed as are a few hundred bewildered working men and women.

The Passaic industrial atrocity has been found out, thanks to a journalism that submits to no tyrant's club. All honor to the camera man who stood the gaff in the front line. All honor to editors in the background who printed the monstrous facts in plain terms.

News pictures tell the truth.

WHY LINAGE STATISTICS

"WHY," inquires a (presumably) young newspaper man, "do you publish statements of newspaper advertising linage? They mean nothing. They are a newspaper's private business, just as much as are its profits or losses. Their use in newspaper promotion advertising is one of the great abuses!"

It is a curious question in this day of newspaper-making. Twenty years ago, one might have expected it and found it difficult to answer. Then, with half a dozen exceptions, newspaper publishers believed that their financial resources and their circulation were their own business, their advertising rates the concern only of themselves and the advertiser whose ability to consume the publisher's wine equalled his skill at cutting the publisher's prices.

The old order has passed. Advertisers learned that vintage wines and economical space-buying did not work on a large scale. Advertisers demanded sworn circulations. The public demanded to know who owned the newspapers, who paid the losses, who took the profits, who directed the policies. The Bourne law of 1912 resulted. Advertisers, working this time without government help, have made the majority of rate cards as simple as a child's primer.

To these established yardsticks of the newspaper as a medium of mass-selling the past decade has added the tables of advertising linage—the chart of newspaper performance, it might be called. Taken alone, without the other indicative factors of merit, linage statistics may well be misleading. The same can be said of any statement regarding a newspaper, a man, or a race-horse. Detailed linage figures, analyzed circulation statistics, a knowledge of the newspaper's content, its clientele and its policies—all are essential to the intelligent purchase of so powerful an agent as newspaper advertising space. The picture is incomplete if any of this information is missing.

Much remains to be done, however, before linage figures attain their full value. Only the germ now exists of a uniform system of measurement. Untruth or exaggeration of linage figures is not common, but it is not unknown. Accurate records are being kept by an increasing number of newspapers, but guesswork retains some friends. All of these can be, and we think, will be, remedied.

Published linage figures go back only 12 years and are fairly complete only for the past five years. Obviously, their real utility is still in the future. Within a few years it will be possible, no doubt, to plat the curve of advertising and to predict its trend far enough in advance for publishers to plan their business accordingly. A beginning along this line has, in fact, been made.

"Nobody's business," as our friend calls it, is obeying the adage and becoming "everybody's business."

The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light.—Romans, XIII; 12.

CAN YOU BEAT IT?

SOMEONE in the employ of MacManus, Incorporated, at Detroit, recently broadcast to newspapers a display advertisement for Osborn Brushes, three columns by 11 inches. The advertisement contained a statement by Alfred P. Haake, director of research for the Simmons Co., said to be a national authority on distribution. It was a very good little preachment to housekeepers that the place to buy safe merchandise on economical terms is at the retail store, not from door-bell ringers.

But the proposition that MacManus, Incorporated, made was even nervier than the usual door-step performance. The letter said that the advertisement (it was a hot selling argument for Osborn Brushes, "Know them by the Blue Handle") was being used in a couple of national magazines at regular space rates, but if newspaper advertising managers would dig up some local department store willing to pay for the space MacManus would furnish the mat. And, then, by golly, if the newspaper could not find a local dealer willing to pay, the paper itself might "decide to publish the advertisement over the signature of your paper—using this opportunity to sell your public and your local advertisers on the service the retailer renders."

You get the point readily enough, don't you? Just run this brush advertisement free to show your retail merchants that you are on their side.

We do not believe that many publishers followed this suggestion. Many of the circular letters that MacManus sent to the press last week were promptly forwarded to Editor & Publisher this week by indignant advertising executives the burden of whose comment was, "Can you beat it?"

Always the possibility exists that the idealist's theory may be worth serious consideration and that the practical man's idea is not a baited hook for poor fish.

MRS. LAURA NELSON KIRKWOOD

MRS. LAURA NELSON KIRKWOOD was the devoted daughter of a great father. Reared in the newspaper atmosphere, she had an instinctive love and respect for the highest type of journalism—newspapers that serve their readers without fear, favor or compromise. Mrs. Kirkwood did not feel that she qualified as a "newspaper woman," but the truth, well established in the office of the Kansas City Star, was that her gentle spirit and clear intellect were guiding factors in the conduct of the Star following the death of Col. Nelson. Her trusteeship was splendidly executed. To Irwin Kirkwood and the staff of the Star the sympathy of American journalism will be extended, for the loss of this gentle woman is personal to a wide circle of newspaper makers.

The newspaper is a highly perishable commodity; memorable editorial service is the only preservative.

THE HAINES BENEFACTION

IT has been the policy of Editor & Publisher to present to readers all of the news facts concerning the Haines press foundation in Florida. The foundation is now in the hands of a committee headed by Lew B. Brown, publisher of the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Independent. In the course of time, it is hoped, a practical plan will be worked out which will be acceptable to newspaper men in general.

At this time it might be well to point out a few facts which Editor & Publisher believes to be fundamental: The question is wholly beside the point whether the gift of 1,000 acres in Florida may or may not have been for publicity purposes; a committee of responsible newspaper men have accepted the land and $50,000 of Mr. Haines' money, and there are no strings to the use to be made of the land. If the publicity stimulates interest in Florida in general, or the district wherein the land is located, so be it—the land nevertheless belongs to a responsible committee representing the press. If the development of the land enhances the value of adjoining property and someone makes money from it, it would not be different from what usually happens in every city when some generous man opens a park. What of it? The land may be worth $50 an acre, $1,000 an acre, and may increase or decrease in value, but it still remains a thousand acres held by a committee of newspaper men who have a vision of some kind of a journalism settlement there.

Two elements, both raised by Mr. Haines, must be handled with decision by the committee, in our opinion. Mr. Haines' idea that the future may see in Press City a super-organization of journalism, operating outside of the press itself, is mistaken, impractical and wholly undesirable. The power of the press inherently lies within its columns. There it is a safe and usually a beneficent power. At least it is under control. No great movement in behalf of human progress, even such a high object as universal peace, would justify the establishment of a super-press organization such as Mr. Haines described in an interview with the editor of this journal two weeks ago.

By the same token, the newspaper men of the country can not and will not participate in the collection of funds to build at Press City state hotels, a great auditorium, a school of journalism or any of the imposing projects that Mr. Haines thought they might undertake. Newspaper men do not collect funds for themselves. It is a point in ethics which them. If donations come to Press City they will as voluntary as was the gift of the land itself.

Both Mr. Haines and Major Brown, in discussing this matter, declared that men of fortune often desire to find worthy objects for their benefactions and that if there was an established project for newspaper men it would be in line for such gifts. That is possible.

It is rather early to attempt to make suggestions to the committee. We believe the foundation is being undertaken in the best of faith and that something good may come of it.

Usually the "why of it" is the big story.

ADVISES CHURCHES TO USE ADVERTISING—

"The time is not far distant when the successful church must advertise," said the President of the Advertising Club of San Diego in an address before the brotherhood of a San Diego church. "This is the age of appeal through the visual message and in order to reach the masses the church must make liberal use of newspaper space and other forms of advertising."

Church Advertising Committees in other Advertising Clubs throughout the country are sowing the seed and preparing the way for efficient church advertising.

It is up to the newspaper to present its merits as a worthy medium for church publicity.

GALLI-CURCI'S

Adventures 'Round the World

The Public Ledger telephoned from Philadelphia for an option as soon as it heard of this great series.

Herbert Gunnison said at once this is something The Brooklyn Eagle must have.

The Boston Globe and New Haven Register wired their order immediately upon receipt of circular.

Here is one of the most vivid series the Cosmos Syndicate has ever offered to newspapers.

They have the swing and dramatic interest of entertaining fiction, and yet they are actual experiences of the most famous singer of her time.

The series to consist of eight pages is offered as a weekly page feature in mat form or typewritten manuscript with photographic prints for your own set-up and make-up.

This series is for immediate release, while Galli-Curci is being acclaimed in every part of the country. A collect telegram is the best way to insure getting it.

WILMINGTON (DEL.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE has just raised a special fund of $30,000 for development and advertising purposes in the year 1926. A special bureau will be created to handle the fund. William F. Metten, publisher of the Wilmington Every Evening, heads the movement as president of the Chamber.

"Newspaper Night" was observed at the mid-winter dinner of the CHI PSI alumni of Harvard College last week, the affair being attended by numerous Boston newspaper men. J. E. King, of the Boston Transcript, presided, and the principal address of the evening was given by Willis J. Abbot, editor of the Christian Science Monitor. Other newspaper men present were Kent Perkins, of the Boston Herald; Paul Nafe, Christian Science Monitor, and Stewart T. Beach, managing editor of the Independent.

WILMINGTON (Del.) ADVERTISING CLUB, at a meeting held in conjunction with the Mercantile Section of the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce recently, indorsed the proposition to raise a fund of $200,000 to advertise the Del-Mar-Va peninsula. The development project is in the hands of a general committee of business men from all parts of Delaware and the eastern shore of Maryland and Virginia.

NEWSPAPER CLUB OF BOSTON, at its annual meeting last week, elected George W. Perkins, of the Globe, editor-in-chief; Edward E. Whiting, Herald, managing editor; Fred C. Green, Transcript, reporter. A silent toast was drunk in memory of John Buckanan, late of the Globe, who had been a member of the club for many years.

SCHOOLS

THE class in copy reading and editing in the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism of the University of Georgia is now publishing three times a week the Athens Journal, a phantom newspaper with a ghostly circulation. Through the courtesy of the Associated Press, the class receives the complete A. P. Georgia day report, and from the class in reporting all the local Athens news of the day is obtained. The class is divided up into managing editor, telegraph editor, make-up editor, copy readers, etc., who are in charge of the paper.

Two hundred fifty high school journalists of the state of Michigan gathered in Ann Arbor Friday for the fifth annual convention of the Michigan Interscholastic Press Association, held under the auspices of the Department of Journalism of the University of Michigan and Sigma Delta Chi, journalistic fraternity.

Maurice E. Votaw, professor of journalism at St. John's University in Shanghai, arrived in Shanghai, Feb. 20 after having spent several months on furlough at his home in Columbia, Mo.

Cornell Chapter of Sigma Delta Chi, national professional journalistic fraternity, has set the dates of Friday and Saturday, March 26 and 27, for the annual conference of the Eastern Interscholastic Publications Association, at Ithaca, N. Y. Editors, managers and faculty advisers from more than 75 leading scholastic publications in New York and nearby states are expected to be present.

Canada Liberals Plan New Daily

London, Ont., may have a third daily, if plans laid by a group of local and distinct liberals bear fruit. A committee has been formed to purchase equipment and a property has been optioned for a location. Date of commencement of publication has not been settled but it is hoped to launch paper in May.

All-Year Club Maps Huge Campaign to Attract Tourists Giving Bulk of Space to Dailies—Starts March 28

On the proved record of results obtained from newspaper advertising in the last five years, the All-Year Club of Southern California this year will spend most of its advertising appropriation in the newspapers.

The schedule, as completed March 2, calls for the publication of 311,000,000 separate advertising impressions. They will appear in 85 newspapers in 56 cities from the Middle West to the Atlantic seaboard. This will be supplemented by magazine advertising that will bring the total up to 400,000,000 impressions.

The advertising schedule was announced by C. G. Milham, executive secretary of the club. This year's campaign is two and one half times as great as that of 1925.

It was pointed out by club executives that the advertising last fall and winter resulted in hotel and railroad men reporting the heaviest tourist season in the country's history, and it is with the hope of repeating this record during the summer months that the present campaign is being launched.

The newspaper ads are in three sizes —three columns wide and 15 inches deep —three columns wide and eight inches deep—and one column wide and 5 inches deep.

Advertising starts March 22, and continues until July 1. The average number of ads to be carried by each newspaper is 24.

$246,000 FOR PROMOTION

Chicago Tribune Spent That Sum in 1924 for Advertising Space

A. Myhrum, manager of the western division of the national advertising department of the Chicago Tribune, commenting recently on the success of the Tribune's booklet "Buying Space to Sell Space," said that many newspapers had considered and used all media other than newspapers in soliciting circulation and advertising.

"The greatest recommendation that a salesman can make in selling me anything," Mr. Myhrum said, "is to tell me that he himself can guarantee the worth of the article through personal experience of its use. And that is what The Tribune has done and is doing.

"We are spending money in other newspapers to sell national advertising. We not only believe in the efficacy of our own medicine but we use it ourselves. Six hundred million dollars advertising revenue accrued to American newspapers in 1924.

"Many newspaper publishers sometimes convey the impression that they have no belief in their own product. They will sell space, but they won't buy newspaper space to tell advertisers their story."

Mr. Myhrum went on to quote from figures in the booklet, showing that the biggest buyers of space in the Tribune among newspaper publishers were men like William Randolph Hearst and Cyrus H. K. Curtis, and pointing out that there was a direct relationship between leadership and a faith in advertising.

The Tribune spent for advertising soliciting national advertising in 1924 the sum of $246,000 Of this, $173,000 was spent in newspapers (other than The Tribune itself); $50,000 was spent for mail advertising, and $23,000 was spent in trade journals.

COL. R. M. JOHNSTON, HOUSTON EDITOR, DIES

Served Houston Post 34 Years and Had Notable Public Career—Once a Vice-President and Director of A.P.

Col. R. M. Johnston, 76, formerly editor and president of the Houston Post who died at Houston last Sunday was a veteran Texas newspaper man and prominent politically, having been appointed United States Senator upon resignation of Senator Joseph W. Bailey, in 1913. Prior to that time he was Texas Democratic National Committeeman.

Col. Johnston retired from active work in 1919 when Roy Watson became head of the Houston Post, but remained chairman of the board and was still a member of the board when the paper was consolidated with the Dispatch in 1924. He continued and at the time of his death was a director of the Post-Dispatch.

Col. Johnston was for two years a vice-president and later a director of the Associated Press. He was born at Sandersville, Ga., and was in the newspaper business most of his life. He early entered a print shop, although service in the Confederate army interrupted his newspaper career to which he returned after the civil war.

He married Mary E. Parsons at Jacksonville, Fla., and with her came to Texas in 1878. He first came into prominence as a newspaper man on the Austin Statesman, later becoming Austin correspondent of the Houston Post, then owned by a stock company. The Post was suspended, however, until 1885, when a new company was formed with Col. Johnston, editor-in-chief.

Following death of his former associate J. L. Watson he became president as well as editor.

During his newspaper career Col. Johnston took an active part in the civic affairs of Houston, being a staunch supporter of the plan to bring deep water to Houston.

JOHN A. EUBANK

Houston Post and Richmond Times-Dispatch Veteran Dies

John A. Eubank, veteran newspaper man and formerly connected with the Richmond Times-Dispatch, died in Houston, Tex., at the home of a daughter, Mrs. F. R. Warn. Mr. Eubank was prominent in newspaper circles in Texas and Virginia, but recently retired from active newspaper work. He was in newspaper work for more than 40 years, beginning his career on the Mexia (Tex.) Weekly Ledger when he was 18 years old. At one time he controlled three small Texas newspapers.

After selling the Corpus Christi Democratic Eagle, Mr. Eubank went to Houston in 1902 and became associated with the Houston Post under Col. R. M. Johnston, where he remained for nearly 15 years. He was an editorial writer and also wrote a weekly lay sermon. After leaving the Houston Post, Mr. Eubank was associated with the Richmond Times-Dispatch, until his retirement, when he returned to Houston.

Northampton Veteran Dead

Edward C. Gere, 70, managing editor of the Northampton (Mass.) Daily Gazette, died at his home Tuesday morning after an illness of several weeks. Mr. Gere has been connected with newspaper work for more than 40 years beginning work as a typesetter when the Gazette was a weekly paper. Mr. Gere has served two terms on the city council and was a trustee of the Northampton State Hospital.

G. G. Martin, A. P. Man, Dies

George Greig Martin, 79, for 25 years in the New York office of the Associated Press, died at his Brooklyn home, Feb. 25. He came to this country from Scotland in 1850, settling in Milwaukee, where he started newspaper work on the Milwaukee Sentinel. He went to Chicago in 1865, and was for some years managing editor of the Chicago Times. Subsequently he edited the Helena (Mont.) Independent, Chicago Evening Post and Chicago Evening Journal. He joined the A. P. in 1894 and has been day editor and night editor in New York.

O. J. Houck, Intertype Man, Dies

Oliver Judson Houck, 46, well-known printer and representative of the Intertype Corporation, died Feb. 22, after a prolonged illness at his home in Hackensack, N. J. Mr. Houck served an apprenticeship as compositor on the Albany (N. Y.) Evening Journal in the days when the type for that newspaper was set by hand. In 1913 he became associated with the American Type Founders Company as salesman and erector for the Unitype machine, where he continued for four years. In 1917 Mr. Houck joined the sales organization of the Intertype Corporation, where he remained until his death.

Mrs. James W. Brown, Jr.

Mrs. Thelma Pitz Brown, wife of James W. Brown, Jr., promotion manager of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, passed away March 3, after several weeks' illness. Services were held Friday evening at the home of her parents in Kew Gardens. Interment on Saturday was private. Mrs. Brown, who was 23 years of age, is survived by her husband and an infant daughter.

Columbus Citizen Editor Dead

Howard P. Woodbury, editor of the Columbus (O.) Citizen since 1923 died at the Columbus Hospital on March 1, from peritonitis, which developed from acute appendicitis. Mr. Woodbury underwent an operation two days previous. He was 38 years of age and was taken ill at his desk. He joined the staff of the Citizen in 1907.

EIGHT STATES SHO LOSS OF 64 DAILIES

U. of Missouri Survey Also Rev Strong Movement Away fro Political Partizanship—Penn-sylvania Loses 41

A decrease in the number of d newspapers in the United States and increase of independent dailies at the pense of partisan newspapers are the standing tendencies of the journal field, as shown by a survey just c pleted by the University of Missouri.

Eight states were included in the vey—Missouri, Pennsylvania, Califo Montana, Minnesota, New Hamps New York and Georgia.

There were 66 fewer daily newspa in the eight states in 1925 than in 1 The greatest loss was shown in P sylvania, with a decrease of 41. fornia was the only state to show a during the decade, showing an increa 9 dailies. Georgia and Minnesota sh no change in their totals.

The loss in the Democratic dailie the eight states was 54 and in Repub dailies 34. The Progressives lost papers, and the smaller groups a number. The loss was partly bala by an increase of twenty-three pendent dailies.

The latter figure is of significanc the survey shows that in 1915, 48 787 dailies, or more than 61 per claimed some sort of political allegi Ten years later less than 53 per cen 381 out of 721, were partisan papers.

Of the large cities of the country, York, Boston, Cleveland, Los An and Baltimore, in the order na showed increases in the total numb papers from 1915 to 1925, while P delphia, Chicago, St. Louis and burgh showed losses.

NEW ENGLAND

EFFICIENCY HAS INCREASED

New England has taken a determined step toward increased efficiency and the efforts have produced notable advancement in marketing, distribution, sales promotion and business management.

Transportation facilities are now so efficient that merchandise can be moved quickly to prevent the tying up of excess stock.

Labor has cooperated in modern scientific methods for increasing output, with the result that labor is now receiving the highest wage in industrial history.

With the natural reaction for good that comes of cooperation, the increased returns from labor have augmented purchasing power to enormous proportions.

It is natural that advertising should improve concurrently with the other factors necessary for sales promotion, for the message must be properly presented to the consumer. And advertising, with an improved standard of merchandise and better sales promotion, has a finer message to deliver.

Care should be exercised in the selection of the medium through which your advertising is to be presented.

New England is a prolific territory, with the greatest per capita purchasing wealth of the country.

The New England newspapers are home papers.

These Newspapers Cooperate in sales promotion.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

Syndicates Acquire Exclusive Rights to Arctic Exploration Stories—
New Service Offers Weekly Supplement for Children—
James M. Lynch Writes Labor Series

A HALF-DOZEN or more arctic expeditions will get under way this spring and summer and all are attempting to sell exclusive newspaper rights to their stories. Some have succeeded, announcements this week show.

The North American Newspaper Alliance has purchased the news rights to the expedition headed by George H. Wilkins, who is in Fairbanks, Alaska, now, planning to start an airplane flight to the North Pole in two or three weeks' time.

The New York Times has obtained publication rights in America of the Amundsen-Ellsworth expedition, which will use a dirigible airship; Lt. Commander Richard E. Byrd, U. S. N., using airplanes; and a French expedition, which will attempt to reach the Pole by motor sledges with airplane assistance.

Publication rights to the story of the Amundsen-Ellsworth expedition have been obtained by the New York Times in association with the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. The stories of the French polar expedition and of the Byrd expedition have been obtained in association with the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. The news of the three expeditions will be syndicated to a selected group of newspapers in other parts of the United States through Current News Features of Washington, D. C.

It is known that the so-called Collegiate Expedition to the Arctic made up of eastern college alumni has offered to sell the newspaper rights to their proposed adventure next June for $10,000. EDITOR & PUBLISHER was unable to learn this week whether or not the offer was accepted.

One syndicate, not wishing to disclose its name, has obtained an option on the North Pole airplane flight proposed by Lt. Leigh Wade, the "'round-the-world flyer." Lt. Wade is seeking to raise $100,000 with which to build airplanes.

The McClure Newspaper Syndicate announces a boys' and girls' feature called "Through the Arctics with Commander Donald B. MacMillan." MacMillan has explored Finlay Land, Ellesmereland, North Cornwall, has visited the Northern headquarters of all the famous Arctic explorers, crossed Smith Sound ten times and has studied thoroughly the Smith Sound Esquimaux. This series will run daily in 30 instalments.

Daily Feature Newspaper Service, New York, a newcomer in the syndicate field, is offering "Junior Weekly," a tear-out supplement for child readers. It is a four page tabloid made up to be printed as two pages of any full size newspaper. The feature is furnished in matrix form.

Harold C. Trowbridge, executive editor, is a son of the late John W. Trowbridge, who was art director of the Hearst syndicates.

Humor is in charge of Thomas E. McGrath, who was with the International Syndicate, Baltimore, in that capacity, and prior to that with the American Press Association.

Ferd Long of the New York Evening World staff of comic artists contributes a strip each week, and Florence Clark, formerly of the Evening World is man aging editor.

The contents cover the general field of girls' and boys' interests and pastimes. The matter is all original, and Mr. Trowbridge has organized a world-wide staff of correspondents who will furnish, through Junior Weekly, articles with appeal to boys and girls of school age.

The McClure Newspaper Syndicate is offering a series of short weekly articles entitled "Speaking of the World's Work" by James M. Lynch, president of the International Typographical Union, and former chairman of the New York State Labor Commission. The series is scheduled to run for a year.

Miss Frances McDonald is authoress of "Are You Afraid of Marriage," a new daily feature added to the list of Current News Features, Inc., New York.

Sir Philip Gibbs will write a new series of 10 weekly articles for the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, New York, the first he has written expressly for newspapers since his "Adventures in Journalism."

Edgar Guest, Detroit poet, has just completed a lecture tour of the South and has gone to Palm Beach, Fla., to spend the remainder of his winter vacation. Mr. Guest's verse is distributed by the George Matthew Adams Service, Inc., New York.

Ed Wheelan, creator of "Minute Movies," handled by the George Matthew Adams Service, Inc., New York, is vacationing in Miami, Fla.

Graham Hunter, Chicago cartoonist, has signed a long time contract with the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, for distribution of his comic strip "Jolly Jingles."

Don Herold has signed a two-year contract with the New York Herald Tribune Syndicate and will begin April 1 writing a weekly article illustrated by himself under the heading "Don Herold's Corner."

The McClure Newspaper Syndicate is offering a symposium on "How to Secure World Peace" by a number of eminent figures in the public eye including Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, Admiral Fiske, U. S. Navy, Gen. Robert Lee Bullard, U. S. Army (retired), Owen D. Young, chairman of the board of directors of the General Electric Company, William Green, President of the American Federation of Labor, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, noted New York divine, and others who will discuss this subject from the different angles of their respective callings.

Barry Duffer, cartoonist of "McDuffer" of the Associated Editors Syndicate, is to be honor guest of a group of golfers who plan to play the courses of 17 cities in the south.

Laurence Stallings, literary editor of the New York World, has been granted a leave of absence to write a new moving picture scenario. Harry Salpeter, his assistant, has taken over Stallings' column "The First Reader," handled by the New York World Syndicate.

The McClure Newspaper Syndicate will offer a symposium on "Your Marriage Problem" by a group of prominent English authors including Ruby M. Ayres, Baroness Orczy, Cynthia Stockley, Mrs. Cecil Chesterton, Mrs. Bellocc-Lowndes, Vere Hutchinson (wife of A. S. M. Hutchinson, author of "If Winter Comes"), Maude Royden and May Edginton. The English symposium will be followed by a symposium on the same subject by a group of well-known American writers including Corinne Roosevelt Robinson, sister of President Roosevelt, Bessie Beatty, former editor of McCall's Magazine, Gloria Swanson, Isabel Paterson, well known book reviewer and author of "The Fourth Queen," Mary Marshall, fashion authority, and Ida Clyde Clarke, editorial writer of Pictorial Review.

MALT ADVERTISING LEGAL

Judge's Decision Favors Birmingham (Ala.) Post in Test Suit

The right of the Birmingham (Ala.) Post to print advertisements of "Blue Ribbon Malt Extract" was sustained in chancery court Feb. 25, in a decision handed down by Judge William Walker.

The decision followed an injunction hearing on a petition filed against the Post, following publication of one of the company's advertisements, Feb. 23. The state contended that malt syrup and malts could not be advertised under a recent legislative act making it unlawful to advertise prohibited liquor or intoxicating beverages.

Attorneys for the Post contended that the advertisement did not come under the statute in question.

Defense attorneys showed that in its present form malt syrup or malt could not be used as a beverage or drink and that in its present form it is not intoxicating. They pointed out that it had the same status as corn or sugar and that if the statute prohibited the advertising of malt it might prohibit the advertising of any other product which could possibly be used in making prohibited beverages.

Judge Walker ruled:

"This malt in its present form is neither a beverage or an intoxicating drink. This statute should be strictly construed and in doing so the grounds in the complaint are not well taken. There are many substances that are advertised from which intoxicating beverages can be made, but which in their present form are harmless.

"The injunction is therefore denied."

This was the first time that such a case had been brought in Alabama.

MEXICO LINKED WITH U. S.

Agreement Reached Between Western Union and President Calles

An agreement, subject to approval of President Calles and the boards of the Western Union and the Mexican Telegraph Companies, will result in establishment of communication without relay between the United States and Mexico for the first time in history, it was announced this week. No opposition to the agreement is expected.

Negotiations were concluded by J. C. Willever, commercial vice-president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, who wired Newcomb Carlton, president, that the new arrangement means that Mexico City has been placed as close to New York telegraphically as Chicago or Boston.

FLORIDA DAILY MOVES

Daytona Beach Journal Printing From Newly Equipped Plant

The Daytona Beach (Fla.) Journal, only morning newspaper in the Halifax country district of Florida, has moved into its new building on Orange avenue.

The building was constructed especially for the Journal and is one of the model plants of Florida. The business, advertising and circulation offices are on the ground floor, with the press room in the rear.

The news room, engraving plant, photographer's darkroom, composing room, and publisher and editor's offices are on the second floor.

Equipment for the paper is new throughout. A battery of six new Intertypes has been installed, and a new tubular press is in operation.

Horace E. Loomis, former business manager of the Miami Daily News, recently became publisher of the Journal. R. H. Dunlap, former advertising manager of the Miami Daily News, is business manager, and Sam M. Ballard, former city editor of the Miami News, is editor.

Complete reorganization of the news department has been effected by Mr. Ballard during the last two months. Ross Doyle, city editor, has come from the Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph; John Denson, news editor, has come to Daytona Beach from the copy desk of the Philadelphia Public Ledger; James Bechtel, from the Daytona (O.) Journal; Thomas Daily from Tampa, Fla., where he went from the Dayton Journal; and Robert R. Read, sports editor, from Columbus, O., where he formerly was sports editor of the Ohio State Journal.

A. C. Clark, formerly composing room foreman of the Miami Daily News, is composing room superintendent of the Journal. Walter Hanna, Nancy Lee O'Neal, and James P. Robinett, formerly of the Miami Daily News advertising staff, are now in the advertising department of the Journal.

ZOË BECKLEY

ZOË BECKLEY'S CORNER is a brisk, newfashioned "help column" of forthrightness and common sense. It is about 500 words long and runs six a week. Questions from readers, and human problems that crop up in the day's news, supply its subjects.

Everybody has problems and everybody needs a friend whose advice is sound, cheerful, practical and from the viewpoint of today. But everybody does not always seek this friend among the homefolks for reasons various and sundry—as Zoë Beckley's letters from readers attest. In her they find a woman of experience and judgment, of wide contacts and warm understanding, one who knows life from every angle—office-grind to globe-trotting; meetings with celebrities and minglings with the so called "common herd." It is the "common herd" that Zoë Beckley loves and speaks to, for whose troubles she has the answer—or the philosophy that eases the unanswerable.

THE CORNER fits equally well upon Magazine or Editorial Page, drawing followers of every type and both sexes.

After a dozen years of continuous journalism, when the New York Evening Mail raised her salary to a new high mark, the business manager said, "Don't thank the paper; the paper thanks you."

Which tells her story as a circulation-getter.

along interested as any boy would be in the excitement."

In telling her story to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Miss Dayton also stressed the fact that the police were given no occasion to strike out at the newspaper men.

"I realize that reporters and photographers sometimes are provocative," she said. "But such was not the case in this instance. We were not hindering the police in any way. There was no reason for their act except an evident wish to take our notes away and frighten us into keeping quiet.

"I had names and addresses of strikers attacked in my notes that were torn up. Mr. Allen's notes were also taken from him and thrown away. The policemen just seemed to go wild."

Miss Dayton, whose full name is Dorothy Dayton Jones, came to New York originally from Texas, where she worked on the San Antonio Express. Before joining the Sun staff last September, she worked for the Oklahoma City Times, where she exposed conditions in the state penitentiary.

Newspaper men who asked questions were pushed on by the vigorously wielded batons while policemen swore and called them "nosey," according to the New York Times' account of the Clifton attack.

During the mêlée flashlights began to pop like cannon shots, and it was then that Captain of Detectives Battello ordered his men to prevent the camera men from making pictures of the scene.

Thomas Flanagan, news photographer for the Daily Mirror of New York, was the first cameraman attacked by the police. "There he is," shouted one patrolman. "Let's get him." Flanagan, who had been warned that the police would "get him," was unable to escape as a motorcycle patrolman grabbed his left hand and a bluecoat seized him by the right. One closed in on him from the rear. He was beaten over the back and shoulders, his camera smashed and two policemen rushed him several hundred feet. This incident was observed by Carl W. Fasold of the Pathé News, who was slowly grinding foot after foot of the scene. Five patrolmen observed him at about that time, and while two grabbed the motion picture camera, the others beat Fasold and pushed him down the street. They smashed the camera against the pavement.

Harry Warnecke, photographer for the Daily News, had just snapped a picture of the assault on Fasold when six policemen turned on him, tore the camera out of his hand, banging him over the knuckles with their sticks when he clung to the box. Fasold saw the valuable lens roll down the street. He sprinted after it, and just as he picked it up, a policeman hit him over the fingers with a club, lacerating his hand. The lens fell to the ground and the policeman pitched it down the street.

John Painter, a Fox news reel photographer using a $2,500 Akely camera was set upon from behind by patrolmen, who wrenched the tripod and used it as a lever with which to batter the camera to a mass of junk.

By this time the crowd was jeering and howling, and other patrolmen dispersed group after group with clubs. Three camera men held the fort from roofs and fire escapes trying to get pictures for their papers.

Fred Must of the New York Daily Mirror was the young man who jumped into a kitchen to escape the police. He threw his camera under a couch and argued the frightened woman into returning to her duties instead of calling the police.

Arthur G. Miller, photographer for the New York American, jumped fifteen feet off a fire escape to get away from the policemen. He escaped after scaling several fences, his camera intact.

Julius Geller of the Evening Graphic was beaten over the back while taking a picture, but he escaped in a store and saved his camera.

A newspaper man who asked a policeman to show him where the city line began, was beaten over the back by the officer.

Otto Bauman of the New York Daily Mirror was knocked down by a policeman, but saved his camera. Fred Delavan, another camera man, was beaten and his box smashed.

Selmar Shuecken, a reporter for the New York Volkszeitung, a German Communist daily, was struck by a policeman's club.

Newspaper men of Passaic also were victims of police clubbings.

Edwin Williams and Ellis Rawnsley of the Passaic Herald were hit by nightsticks. Richard Cole, of the same newspaper, was bundled off his feet by the cops.

Michael Supko, Passaic News, was thrown into the crowd by the police, and D. Arthur O'Brien, also of the News, had his notes snatched from him.

The story printed by the Passaic Herald, accused by strike leaders as being mill-owned, asserted that the Clifton police used "night sticks on men and women." A Herald staff man reported he had seen six women beaten by police.

The Passaic News story on the riot stressed an assertion to the effect that the strikers were blocking traffic, were ordered to disperse by the police, and refused.

The manner in which the story was handled by certain New York newspapers was held to be "a contemptible practice in journalism" by R. E. Lent, Passaic News, in a statement to EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

"Certain of the New York newspape of the less conservative type are wilfu besmirching the fair name of our ci by misrepresenting the actual situation it exists here," he charged.

"Up to the present time there have be no casualties, and not a single hospi case. The Passaic police have been e tirely successful in preserving law.

"Some of the papers have been gui of what I consider a contemptible pra tice in journalism, in that pictures sho ing peaceful crowds have been caption in such a way as to give an entirely d ferent impression. The fact there h been no hospital case is sufficient pro that the police have acted fairly."

William M. McBride, editor of t Passaic Herald, said to EDITOR & PU LISHER:

"Back of the police attack on t camera men was, I imagine, a resentm

STAFF MAY PURCHASE KANSAS CITY STAR

First and primarily, the Star; second, the Sni-a-Bar farms, dedicated by Mr. Nelson to the improvement of the live-stock industry; third, art and the promotion of art appreciation in Kansas City and the southwest; and fourth, the prosperity and upbuilding of Kansas City. In all of these interests she was carrying on the work that had been started by her father and that she felt it her duty to develop. It is impossible to understand the later years of Mrs. Kirkwood's life without a knowledge of her earlier years when she was the companion and chum of the great editor.

In an apartment at 11th and Central streets, Feb. 14, 1883, the Nelsons' one child was born.

As the family prospered with the growth of the Star, the Nelsons went to live at the Coates House. There are still residents of Kansas City who recall the little, restless black-haired girl who used to be flying around the old hotel, an eager, sensitive child.

Mr. Nelson disliked hotel life. The summers were hot in town. Out in the country, far beyond the city limits, he bought a farmhouse with ten acres of ground. This house he made over as a sort of summer camp. It was the beginning of Oak Hall.

In 1894, when Laura was 11 years old, the family went to Paris, where the girl was put in school. From this center frequent excursions were made to England and the continent. The father gave attention to the language and picked up a good reading knowledge of French while his daughter was learning to speak it.

She would go with him as interpreter, "but," she explained later, "Dad always knew what was said, and if I didn't translate accurately he would correct me."

After a stay of two years in Europe the family returned to Kansas City. The growing companionship between father and daughter was continued in letters when they were separated. The letters were invariably written in lead pencil on scratch paper at the editor's office.

The next two years Laura spent in the Barstow School in Kansas City. In the fall of 1898, when she was 15, she was placed in Miss Emerson's School in Boston. It was the first real separation and to the parents it was heart-breaking. The daughter, too, was homesick and unhappy away from father and mother.

The daughter finished at Miss Emerson's and once more was back home with her parents at Oak Hall. More than two years later she went to Europe, taking as companion a woman who had been one of her instructors at Boston. Study and travel into remote corners prolonged this trip to more than a year.

Laura and her companion proposed a journey into remote parts of ancient Greece, to which the father, at first dubious, gave finally hearty assent. But he made it an occasion for another preachment on the prudent use of money.

The years abroad were years of great adventure for Laura Nelson. She was particularly fond of telling this story of one of her adventures. It was characteristic, for it revealed her daring spirit. "My companion, a former teacher, and I," she said, "had been traveling in the south of France. Dad thought I was fairly safe, for he had given me my allowance and had told me it must do for the next six weeks. We were in Marseilles when it occurred to me it would be a lark to start for the unknown.

"We were traveling light, each with a handbag. We got our bags and went down to the harbor. A steamer was lying there, evidently just ready to sail. We didn't know what its name was or where it was going, but we hired a boatman to row us out. We got on board. It was a freighter bound for Egypt, and there were no passengers. But we persuaded the captain to take us.

"We had a glorious time, but rather uneconomical one, for we planned to be gone three months, and I had to make my allowance do for twice as long as I had expected. We came back through Spain. When we reached Madrid we were flat broke. I managed to borrow money from the hotelkeeper to pay our fare to Paris. I've always had great admiration for that hotelkeeper. He was taking a chance, but he was game."

Laura Nelson's wanderings abroad were ended by her marriage. In 1905 a young man from Baltimore, Irwin Kirkwood, had come to Kansas City to go into the real estate business. Being from Maryland, he was an enthusiastic horseman. At the Missouri Hunt and Polo Club one afternoon soon after his arrival he had met the editor's daughter. They were married November 15, 1910, in New York City, by the then rector of Trinity, the Rev. W. T. Manning, now Bishop of New York, in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson and a few friends.

After the marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Kirkwood settled in Kansas City. Their interests were absorbed in the Star and in the other enterprises Mr. Nelson had on foot. Especially were they concerned with the progress of the Sni-a-Bar farms, where he had started an elaborate experiment in building up a pure-bred herd of short-horn cattle with the use of pure-bred sires and grade cows. They made a journey to England to buy pure-bred bulls for the herd.

When the war began in 1914, a Red Cross chapter was organized in Kansas City, and it was decided to raise a fund to use in Red Cross work abroad. Mrs. Kirkwood became president of the Kansas City Chapter and was in direct charge of the raising of the money. The first of the great war drives was put over successfully in Kansas City under her direction.

The winter that followed was one of unemployment and distress. The plight of the sufferers appealed to Mrs. Kirkwood and she established as a personal gift a kitchen, where hot meals were served free to all who asked.

Here it may properly be said that the very large contributions made in the name of the Star to the war funds and later to the allied charities, were given by Mrs. Kirkwood out of her personal income. She was always eager to help every worthy cause to the extent of her ability —and beyond.

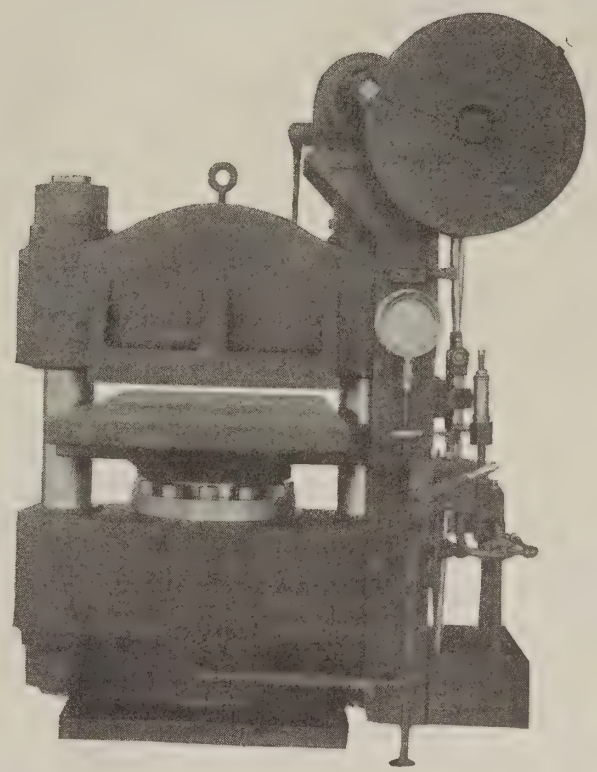
Mr. Nelson died April 13, 1915. Under the provisions of his will Mrs. Nelson and Mrs. Kirkwood became trustees for the estate. On them developed the management of the Star, the Sni-a-Bar farms and extensive holdings in real estate.

It was their announced purpose to continue the Star on the lines laid down by Mr. Nelson. They were actively concerned with the standards of public service and of good taste he had established.

One of the important achievements in this period was the obtaining of the services of Theodore Roosevelt as contributing editor in 1917.

This, Mrs. Kirkwood felt, would be a great contribution toward helping arouse the American people to the immense war task before them. In an interview in EDITOR & PUBLISHER, in September of that year, Mrs. Kirkwood set forth ideals which animated her and her mother. Speaking of the Roosevelt contributions she said:

"This is in line with my father's ideals. He saw, always, in the Star an instrument of public service—nothing less, nothing more. He left a great legacy to the Star family—a newspaper which had won its place through absolute independence, owing no allegiance to any private interest, holding no grudges against individuals, weighing nothing as gain which did not contribute to civic betterment. The Star was always fighting, but it never fought for anything in which my father did not believe with all of his big mind and heart. Whether the Star's fights were won or lost did not matter so much to him as the facts that they were made, and made with all his power he could summon.



"It seems to us who are trying to carry on his work that in leaving the Star to us of the Star family he left more than a great property—he transmitted to us a great ideal something—if I may use such

(Bi-rota-druck)

Hydraulic Matrice Press and Process

Direct Pressure Matrice Die Embossing

The American Birotadruck matrice press and process is a hydraulic direct pressure matrice moulding press and process —definite in all its functions moulding a perfect die cut and embossed mat ready for the casting box without loss of time. Through the Birotadruck method pressure on the machine is under complete control, without slip, drop or vibration and may be maintained indefinitely.

No More Crushed Type or Blurred Pages

Any desired pressure may be obtained without injury to type or illustrations. Under the Birotadruck process half tone illustrations are embossed and the matrice die sunk simultaneously with the moulding operation. The plate cast in the casting box carries a mechanical reproduced embossing, sinking the high lights and raising the deep tones on half tone photo engravings, thus securing the same effect on rotary printing presses as obtained by underlaying cuts and overlaying tympan on flat bed and offset presses.

No Change in Equipment

There are no changes necessary on presses, stereo or other equipment. The Birotadruck Matrice Press and Process takes the place of Matrice Rolling machines and adds refinements and features not heretofore available in matrice moulding.

Either wet or dry mats may be used with full success.

The Birotadruck Press and Process

is the recently perfected European newspaper picture printing process now being used by a number of Continental European Daily newspapers. By this hydraulic press and process clean, deep cut mats are produced in from thirty to forty seconds. The operation is simple and "fool proof" and automatic in control. The American Birotadruck Company has further perfected the original press and it is built to American standards in this country.

Installations have been made on the plants of the New York Times, New York Herald-Tribune, Boston Globe, Dallas News and machines are being built on orders from other metropolitan newspapers.

a phrase—of even more spiritual than material value. It was a big burden to lay down—a big one to take up and carry forward."

The interviewer added that Mrs. Kirkwood recalled that one of her father's favorite maxims had often puzzled her. He was in the habit of saying: "We must make the Star interesting to the streetcar driver's wife." Just why he had in mind this particular type, she never understood, but as she grew more familiar with his ideals in newspaper making she realized that he was always aiming to keep the Star on the plane of human appeal, and determined that it should not become in any sense a class newspaper.

With the death of Mrs. Nelson in 1921, Mrs. Kirkwood became sole trustee for the estate, and Mr. Kirkwood the active editor. She was anxious to get in as close touch with the newspaper as possible. A function which she established and maintained for several years was a Saturday night supper at her home. These were attended by the executive heads of the paper, and all its multifarious problems were discussed.

While she was absolutely loyal to her father's ideals, Mrs. Kirkwood felt that loyalty did not mean standing still; it meant progress. She was eager to develop the Star so that it could remain in the forefront of American newspapers.

The news and feature services of the paper were enormously expanded. New equipment was added. For a considerable time there had been discussion of the possibility of adding a magazine to the Sunday issue. As she considered the plan, the idea developed in her mind of doing an unusual thing that would be in keeping with what she conceived to be the ideals of her father. She would print a magazine that would be different from any other newspaper magazine. It would be an artistic publication of the highest class. Its cover page should not be the conventional bathing girl picture. It should be an adequate reproduction of one of the old masters.

"My father," she said, "left all he had to promote interest in art in Kansas City and the southwest. These cover pages will help educate people, especially the children and young people, to an understanding of the best there is in painting."

Her idea succeeded beyond her hopes. In homes and in schools in Kansas City and in all the territory in which the Star circulates the cover pages of the Sunday magazine are framed and hanging, an educational influence whose value cannot be estimated.

In all the fights for the better municipal government in Kansas City, Mrs. Kirkwood was anxious that the Star should do its part, as it had under her father. It continued independent, but not neutral, in politics.

In the city campaign of 1924, she was particularly interested in the meetings for the candidate the Star was opposing. She was eager to hear what the speakers had to say about the newspapers.

"You are so big, you are too conspicuous for my purpose," she said to her husband. "If we went together we would be recognized and things would be said at us, and I might have to hold you by the coat tails to keep you from rushing up to the platform and getting into a low row. Somebody else must go with me." And on two occasions somebody else did. They sat in the rear, and she was rather disappointed at the mildness of the attacks.

"We are giving hard knocks. I expect to take them in return," she said.

Mr. Kirkwood was the editor in active charge. But in every fight that he directed, whether for the navigation of the Missouri river, or for cleaning up Kansas City, he had the staunchest backing of Mrs. Kirkwood as trustee.

"This may cost the Star money," he would warn her at times.

"What of it?" she would reply. "The Star can get along without money, but it can't afford to lower its flag."

Mrs. Kirkwood was an exceedingly vivid personality. A short, slight woman she was, with a mobile face surmounted by a wealth of black hair. She had a keen sense of humor. Her conversation was full of quaint wit. Her extensive travels and her contact with interesting people all over the world had given a fund of information that was always at her service. Her talk was sparkling and never commonplace. She read extensively both in French and English.

The university trustees made this statement March 4 in the Star:

"The university trustees do not intend to interfere in the editorial policies of the Star as established by William R. Nelson and carried on by the present management.

"The Star is being operated on a profitable basis, producing a satisfactory income.

"We believe it is best to continue the present management with Irwin Kirkwood, editor, and A. F. Seested, manager, and we shall proceed to offer the newspaper properties for sale in due time in accordance with the terms of the will of W. R. Nelson.

"Wm. Volker, J. C. Nichols, Herbert V. Jones, University Trustee."

OLIVER JAYNES HEADS ARIZONA PRESS

Tucson Citizen General Manager to Lead Daily Association — Free Space Grafters Scored at Annual Meet

Oliver Jaynes, general manager of the Tucson Citizen was elected president of the Arizona Daily Newspaper Association at the annual meeting of the organization, held in Bisbee recently. Other officers are: Folsom Moore, Bisbee Daily Review, vice-president, and Ralph Ellinwood, Tucson Arizona Daily Star, secretary.

Following the election a business session was held, at which the association went on record as opposed to the publication of the names of minors in accounts of juvenile delinquency, except when the nature of the news compels their use.

It was decided to limit the amount of space used for publicity. It was the sense of the publishers' meeting that the press of Arizona has long suffered through the granting of free space to publicity schemes and hereafter publicity seekers must pay the regular advertising rates.

Advertising agencies operating within the state must comply with the rules and regulations of the American Association of Advertising Agencies before being accepted as regular advertising agencies in Arizona, the publishers decided. A committee of three will be named to pass upon all advertising agencies and investigate their financial resources.

Frank L. Sefrit of Bellingham Herald Elected President at Spokane Meeting—Kent Cooper a Speaker

Washington and North Idaho Associated Press members formed an organization in Spokane at the Northwest Regional Conference, Thursday, Feb. 25, electing Frank L. Sefrit of the Bellingham Herald, president; G. R. Scott of the Coeur D'Alene (Idaho) Press, vice president; M. E. Barker, in charge of the Spokane bureau, secretary, and Frank S. Baker of the Tacoma News Tribune and Ledger, member of the advisory board of the A. P. Kent Cooper, general manager of the A. P. attended the meetings of the state and regional groups, which included Montana as well as Washington and North Idaho members. A banquet was given in honor of the 35 visiting members in the evening by W. H. Cowles, of the Spokane Spokesman Review who, as a director of the Associated Press, also presided at the formal sessions.

"Wars will end when the news goes straight and true to the people of all nations," Mr. Cooper said in speaking at the banquet. "There would have been no world war if the people of all the European nations had been able to receive their news straight and true."

Following the banquet Mr. Cooper spoke over station KHQ on "The Romance of News Collection and Dissemination."

Paul Cowles, Western superintendent of the Associated Press, was also among those at the meeting. Others attending included: R. W. Fisher and D. W. Ifft, editor and publisher respectively, of the Walla Walla Union; Tom Stout, Lewistown (Mont.) Democrat News; George A. Roberts, Helena (Mont.) Record Herald; J. G. CITY EDITOR SETTLES MAINE MILL STRIKE

M. J. Twomey of Biddeford Journal Successful as Peacemaker, Ending 3 Months' Shut-Down—Refuses Mayor's Job

Michael J. Twomey, city editor of the Biddeford (Me.) Journal and for 40 years an employe of that paper, is being credited with bringing about a peaceful settlement of the strike of workers in the mills of the Pepperell Manufacturing Company a week ago.

MICHAEL J. TWOMEY

This settlement by which 3,600 men and women returned to their labors after an idleness of nearly three months was effected, largely through his efforts, after Federal and State labor commissioners had failed to effect conciliation.

The task of peacemaker was a delicate one, but Twomey had the advantage of having been employed at one time in the mills and closely associated with both officials and workers. After several fruitless conferences had been held, and nearly everyone had despaired of bringing the two sides together, he proffered his services to the mill agent and the union executive committee as mediator.

He was successful, with much tact, in drawing out definite proposals upon which a settlement could be based and arranged for a final conference at which an agreement was signed.

Now, he is being accorded full credit for his services, and has been extended a vote of thanks by both the union representatives and the mill officials for bringing to an end one of the most serious labor situations that has ever existed in this city. The nomination for mayor was tendered to him but declined with thanks.

"It is enough for me," he said, "to know that the employes are again working."

Texas Highway Commissioner Pleads Guilty and Pays $16.75

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

AUSTIN, Tex., March 3.—John Cage of Stephenville, Tex., state highway commissioner paid a fine of $16.75 for assault on Silliman Evans, staff correspondent of the Ft. Worth Star-Telegram in the lobby of an Austin hotel Tuesday night. Evans knocked to the stone floor of the hotel fell unconscious and was placed under the care of a physician and nurse.

Cage, it is said, approached Evans with the charge that Evans had done him dirt in an article about designation of a highway between Hico, Tex., and Cage's home town. Evans denied this charge before he was struck.

The Commissioner, charged with assault at Austin, later went 12 miles away to the village of Manchaca and pleaded guilty before a Justice of the Peace.

against what the police claim were 'faked picture situations.'

"I have no personal knowledge of any faking, but police have told me of photographers who asked strikers to attach bandages to their head for pictorial purposes.

"The tabloids have certainly overplayed the situation. An editorial in the Mirror, March 4, refers to 2,000 gas masks, an absurdity. A picture showing Police Chief Zober of Passaic is captioned 'general of the attack,' with 'his hand reaching in his pocket for a tear gas bomb.'

"Zober did not arrive at the scene of the rioting Wednesday until the excitement was over. It happened in Clifton, anyway. The tabloids statements are typical of the way they have handled the story.

"When the strikers paraded recently we counted the lines. Our count was 2,765. It was checked by another man. An Associated Press dispatch at the time approximated the paraders at 3,000; the tabloids estimated there were between 7,000 and 10,000.

"Strike leaders thereupon ordered our paper boycotted, charging we had wilfully underestimated the paraders.

"We have tried to print the news of both sides dispassionately. We could have obtained good will by favoring the strikers. We determined, however, to stick to facts."

Philip A. Payne, managing editor of the Mirror, said to EDITOR & PUBLISHER:

"If any editor or policeman makes the charge that any of my pictures were faked, I will immediately bring suit against him for criminal libel."

All New York dailies gave considerable space to the strike story. It was the lead story in the tabloids, and in all of them it was well illustrated, despite broken plates.

Payne of the Mirror, following a rule adopted last week, led his story off with two Bible quotations.

"He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker," from Proverbs, 14-31, and "He that oppresseth the poor to increase his riches, and he that giveth to the rich, shall surely come to want," were used.

Mayor Hague of Jersey City was quoted as saying the Clifton and Passaic police "committed a damnable outrage."

Twenty-five policemen, the Mirror stated, charged a building in which 15 cameramen had barricaded themselves.

"They burst in doors, overturned furniture and broke windows, seeking the men who had committed the crime of recording police brutality," the story continued.

"But most of them escaped. Only three were caught—and drubbed."

The Mirror was daring in its description of the general riot, during which, the story claimed, the strikers were beaten down and clubbed by alleged drunken cops. The story asserted the police were "leagued with paid thugs and gangsters."

"The saloons are wide open," the story ran. "Whisky is being sold at 10 and 15 cents a drink, and the hired sluggers of the mills are indulging freely."

Larry Froeber, Daily News photographer, was on a roof snapping the scene. When the police attacked, he with two comrades, went into a vacant office below. One of the men had a skeleton key and he opened the door and let his fellows in. Police saw the move and entered. But the cameramen had hidden their cameras in an old stove. Search was made.

"We are damned glad you have no cameras," said the police. "So you can't have any pictures."

Froeber took the cameras from the stove, and the pictures were soon on their way to the Daily News.

A News representative appealed to Gov. A. Harry Moore with a request for assurances against physical violence.

"I am powerless to extend protection to newspaper men working in the strike area unless such protection is specifically demanded by the peace officers of Passaic county," Gov. Moore said. "The sheriff of the county should protect the newspaper men," he added.

On March 4 the Passaic police commissioner issued a statement deploring the attack on the newspaper men.

William J. Coughlin, chief of police of Clifton, served notice he would not permit newspaper photographers to set off flashlights in the strike district. He said the flash explosions added to the disturbance and caused the attack of the night before.

The evening of March 4 passed quietly. Police were quiescent. Strikers caused no trouble.

Full publicity given to the outrage scotched disturbances, temporarily at least. The injuries sustained by the Mirror men, when the tabloid's armored car was struck and overturned, remained the only "hospital cases."

Imperial Serves Oldest Paper in the United States

IT is with a great deal of pride that Imperial counts among the users of the Plus Plan the Hartford Courant—from the standpoint of continuous publication—"the oldest paper in the United States."

One hundred sixty-two years of continuous publication is certainly a record to be proud of. It speaks well for the character of the publication and for the publishers.

The Plus Plan, too, has an old age feature, well worth mentioning. Type Metal served by the Imperial Plus Plan has the advantage of years of efficient, working life over metals not services by this economical plan.

We know of publications served by the Plus Plan that are using the same metal supply that they had when they first started this system six and seven years ago. The publishers tell us this metal is still giving wonderful results. We will be glad to give you the names of these publishers and have you write to them for the story of their results from using the Plus Plan.

UP AND DOWN READING EASIEST FOR EYES

Chinese Vertical Style of Typesetting Superior to English Horizontal Method Stanford University Professor Declares

Investigations indicating to his satisfaction that sentences and paragraphs set vertically are easier to read than type set as in American newspapers have been completed here by Prof. Walter R. Miles in the experimental psychology laboratories of Stanford University.

The recent tendency among publishers of newspapers and magazines in Chinese to set their characters across the page instead of down had confirmed the age-old thought that eye movements across rather than up-and-down caused less strain on the muscles. This, however, continues to be only a popular thought with no basis of truth, according to Professor Miles.

The basis on which he compared the two languages and the efficiency of "up-and-down and across" type was the per-minute rate of reading, the only criterion, perhaps, by which their relative efficiency may be judged.

Here vertical Chinese, thought and said to be the world's most difficult language, was read with much greater speed than English by students of the university who spoke both languages.

In discussing his experiments with a representative of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Professor Miles said:

"In reading any language the eye pauses periodically, then shifts by 'jumping.' At each pause it encompasses one or more characters in the case of Chinese or one or more words, depending upon their length, in the case of English and the European languages.

"While we found students read some 30 words a minute faster when their eyes are trained on vertical type than when reading ordinarily-set English (as this is placed before you), I would not have anyone draw the conclusion that American newspapers should abandon their vertical columns and horizontal type in favor of lines running the full length of the page, with each succeeding letter set beneath its predecessor.

"In fact, while vertical appears to be read with more facility than horizontal, we found that Chinese in any position was easier for the students to read than English.

"The difficulty and strain on muscles of the eye while reading an American newspaper are not such that I would recommend that we change our present newspaper dress."

British Bill Aids Authors

A bill introduced in the British House of Lords aims to protect authors from actions for libel in respect of defamatory matter contained in a literary or dramatic work that purports to be a work of fiction. It would rule out proceedings for libelous, blasphemous, or obscene matter in literary, dramatic or artistic works, unless it is proved that the defendant intended to publish, or publish negligently, such matter concerning the plaintiff.

WETS WIN IN DAILY'S PROHIBITION POLL

Denver Post Referendum Created High Interest and Drew 110,000 Votes —Wets Opposed Voting With Paid Space

Approximately 110,000 men and women cast their ballots for or against prohibition and for or against wine and beer in a Rocky Mountain referendum on prohibition conducted recently by the Denver Post.

Ballots were published in all editions of the Post for eight days beginning Feb. 12. No votes were counted except those on regular Denver Post ballots signed by the full name and address of the voter.

The referendum awakened intense interest. Both wets and drys heatedly argued the value of the referendum, the wets on the whole opposing and the drys favoring it. Anti-prohibition organizations called upon their members not to vote and even used paid advertising advising people against taking part in the referendum.

On the other hand churches put ballot boxes in their auditoriums and delivered the church vote to the offices of the Post.

The total vote polled in Denver was half as many ballots as is cast in that city for a presidential election. The state of Colorado polled 25 per cent of its normal vote of presidential election year.

The result of the referendum, announced as fast as a corps of tellers could count the vote, was: For Prohibition, 20,756; Against Prohibition, 79,700; For Wine and Beer, 83,356; Against Wine and Beer, 18,999—an overwhelmingly wet vote on both questions.

A movement is now on foot by the Denver Post to take the results of the Post referendum to Congress.

To insure fairness in the vote count, the Denver Post appointed as election judges Former Governor Oliver Shoup, Col. Patrick J. Hamrock, Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford of the Colorado W. C. T. U., Fred Farrar, Claude K. Boettcher and Spencer Penrose—all representative citizens of high standing in Colorado.

Ballots came in from all parts of Colorado and from every Rocky Mountain state.

Among the interesting facts brought out by the referendum was the heavy wet vote cast by women. Thirty-eight per cent of the total vote was cast by women and 75 per cent of all women voting marked their ballots wet, the count revealed. The woman vote was 37 per cent of the total wet vote and 40 per cent of the total dry vote.

in your city in the last ten years have extended their trading territories two, three and in some cases four times as a result of our state good-roads system. To the merchant and to the publisher, good roads are vital.

Consider the question of establishing new official holidays. At one time last winter there were seven bills pending before the Ohio Legislature, calling for the creation of new holidays. I need not point out that this is a matter of equal concern to the merchant and to the newspaper. Where the store is forced to close for a holiday the overhead continues and sales opportunities are lost which never can be recovered. The newspaper is affected even more vitally. Where the holiday occurs in mid-week, for example, the evening editions of the day preceding the holiday and the subsequent morning editions are practically dead. Your overhead likewise continues.

Consider the matter of property taxation. You operate your business in expensive downtown location. Your plant, your equipment, and your stocks of news print cannot be hidden from the assessor. Your books must be kept in the daily operation of your business so that they are easily accessible to the tax inquisitor should he seek to determine the value of your accounts receivable, which are taxed as credit. The merchant is exactly in the same position. He occupies even more expensive downtown property; his merchandise stocks cannot be concealed, and his books are always open. Both groups in this state for years have suffered tremendously through unfair taxation, while owners of billions of dollars of intangible wealth are escaping with little or no assessment. Owners and users of downtown real estate are discriminated against in Ohio as in no other modern commonwealth. It is about time that those of us who foot these unjust bills should get together and demand from our government some equalization of our increasing tax burdens.

There is no reason why the newspapers cannot during the next few years develop other special merchandise seasons or translate existing holiday periods more definitely into terms of merchandising. There is no reason why, for example, Mother's Day should not become a general merchandising event. Newspapers very easily could emphasize and intensify the gift-giving possibilities of our spring graduation season. It is quite within the range of possibility that newspapers and merchants could profitably co-operate in a publicity campaign which would greatly increase the volume of sales in connection with vacation preparations.

The newspaper publisher need have no fear that news column exploitation of these general events will relieve the advertiser of the necessity of buying space to promote his special merchandise offerings. It must be clear to anyone that if a newspaper in any community creates a merchandising interest in any given season or event, every intelligent merchant will hasten to identify his particular institution with these special possibilities through liberal use of display advertising.

I feel that completely effective co-operation between the publisher and the merchant must be developed through gradual steps. I believe that if, in any community, the newspaper publisher will carefully study the situation and will inaugurate any one of the devices I have mentioned, he will quickly and rapidly extend the degree of co-operation. It is a field which so vitally affects the future development of your newspaper property that it cannot be approached in a haphazard or incidental manner. It must be studied. Merchants must be educated to understand the publisher's aims and to appreciate the character of the service which you may offer.

If you get a breezy letter, maybe it came by airmail.—Columbia Record.

Local Happenings In INDIANA
Interest The Community

More serious attention is given to the newspapers than to any other medium of information or reader interest.

Advertisements receive greater attention from newspaper readers than is generally supposed. It is not hard to recall some occasion when an advertisement has produced results that bordered on the sensational. Such results are possible only when intense local interest is aroused. Local interest is aroused only through the daily newspapers.

Following the proper distribution of your merchandise in a given territory, it is well, in contemplating an effective sales promotion plan, to consider the contact of local dealer and consumer. They are both your prospects—both readers of the local paper—have mutual interest in your product.

No alert dealer would fail to carry merchandise for which consumer demand is to be created through the local newspapers.

When the local dealer carries your product it is news to the consumer.

Advertise to the Indiana folks through these home papers.

FILM STAR WINS STEP IN LIBEL SUIT

Court of Appeals Reverses Lower Court's Dismissal of Doris Keane's $100,000 Suit Against New York Evening Graphic

Doris Keane, motion picture star, won her case in New York's highest court when the Court of Appeals in Albany Tuesday handed down a decision reversing the lower courts in dismissing her $100,000 libel action against the MacFadden Newspaper Publishing Corporation, publisher of the New York Evening Graphic.

Miss Keane has been the wife of Basil Sydney since 1918, and the alleged libel published, Dec. 15, 1924, stated that "according to rumor, she is 'Fatty' Arbuckle's latest lady love." It appeared on the first page of the paper with a photograph of Miss Keane. Another article in the same issue under a date line of Monterey, Cal., was to the effect that Miss Keane attended a barbecue given by Arbuckle and that no information could be obtained as to whether or not he was to marry her. For the purpose of showing the alleged libelous nature of the publications references were made in the complaint to Arbuckle's murder trials in California, the fact that thereafter his pictures were banned throughout the country because of his alleged notoriously bad reputation.

Justice Aaron J. Levy dismissed the complaint on the ground that the references to Miss Keane were not libelous per se without explanation and the allegation of special damages. Her counsel maintained that a false statement that a married woman was to marry a man of a notoriously bad reputation was libelous per se in holding her up to public ridicule, contempt, scorn, obloquy and shame.

Judge Frederick E. Crane, writing the majority opinion of the court said: "The court should take the defamatory publication in determining its characteristics and result in the same way that the reading public acquainted with the parties and the subject would take it." Judge Cuthbert W. Pound wrote a dissenting opinion with which Chief Judge Frank H. Hiscock concurred.

LAUNCHING SPELLING BEE

Twenty-seven Newspapers Tie-up with Louisville Courier-Journal Contest

The National Spelling Bee, sponsored by the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal nationally and by 27 newspapers locally will be launched this month.

More than $20,000 in prize money is being offered on the various prize lists, and the local winners will be taken to Washington for the finals in June. These prizes will be $2,000 in gold of which $1,000 and a gold medal will go to the winner.

J. A. Humphreys, Jr., news promotion manager of the Courier-Journal is directing the contest. He first inaugurated the Spelling Bee last year, with 10 newspapers assisting.

The following newspapers are sponsoring local contests:

Atlantic City (N. J.) Press-Union; Detroit News; Akron Beacon-Journal; Houston Chronicle; South Bend News-Times; Hartford Times; New Haven Register; Trenton Times; Charlotte Observer; St. Louis Times; Winston-Salem Sentinel; Scranton Republican; New Bedford Standard; Fall River Herald; New Britain Herald; Worcester Telegram-Gazette; Binghamton Press; Fort Worth Press; Memphis Press; Oklahoma City News; Erie (Pa.) Dispatch-Herald; Lancaster (Pa.) New Era; Reading (Pa.) Tribune; Wilmington (Del.) Every Evening; Rockford (Ill.) Republic; Des Moines Register and Tribune.

SUNDAY EDITION LAUNCHED

Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal Venture Starts With 76 Pages

The Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal on Sunday, Feb. 28, launched its new Sunday edition, the initial issue carrying 76 pages. The paper is owned by John H. Perry, owner also of the Pensacola Journal and Pensacola News, and the Reading (Pa.) Times.

The new edition was a success, the publishers assert, and was well received. It carries a magazine feature section of local features, comics, and sections devoted to real estate, automobiles, state news and other activities.

H. W. Schaefer is editor of the Sunday department. He is assisted by Arthur J. Busch.

The Journal recently moved into its new home and held a "house warming" soon afterwards. Its new plant is one of the most modern newspaper establishments in the country. All equipment is new.

considering my circulation wasn't going to be so considered by the A. B. C. I realized that there would be hundreds of names which would never be counted at all, as soon as a circulation man familiar with their system, pointed out to me just how they made their audits. So I was like the rabbit that climbed the tree, I had to do it. About then along came these contest people and I clutched at the opportunity and they did what I asked them to, they gave me the circulation to save my face on my A. B. C. audit.

And so, I say, if a publisher finds that he has to have circulation and have it in a hurry, I don't know of any way to get it on the books as quickly as through one of these bally-hoo contests. As to the character of the circulation, that is another story. The percentage of failure to obtain renewals, which seems large to me, is in itself an index to the character of that circulation. I don't believe that many of those who failed to renew paid much attention to the paper when it came. I'm just that proud of the Columbian to believe that no person in the community could read it for a year and then possibly get along without it. But it was quick circulation which I wanted, and I got just what I wanted and it would ill become me to find fault with the agency which performed the service. Nor am I going to find fault with them. They did in every respect more than they said they would do—in the manner of conducting that contest—and if I want to blame anyone I'll have to blame myself.

I don't believe I would ever put on another contest. I believe that the money spent for prizes, commissions and the other things, if spent in the course of a year in improving the newspaper, in consistent advertising through every possible medium and in careful solicitation in my community, would bring more new subscribers of the right kind than two such contests would bring. Then, too, there's a certain amount of woe to holding a contest and a fearful disruption of the entire office staff. These agency fellows will tell you that "you'll hardly know we're here," but that's quite the opposite of the actual facts. In fact the publisher will hardly know anything else during one of these contests and he'll find it almost impossible to attend to his usual duties. And there's another thing. I can't say just what it is, but there's something of a feeling of losing some of your self-respect in one of these. You can't just describe it, but you find yourself wondering what your associates think of you for resorting to such methods of business, and honorable though they may be, you don't just feel right about it all.

There's no such feeling about it in going after circulation through pepping up your sport page, giving more thought to your editorial column, improving the make-up of your paper and trying to improve the picture service you are giving your readers. Those things have quite the opposite effect on one's self-respect. It's such a clean, decent way to go after circulation. It may not get the results so quickly, but I'll venture that there'll be no 50 per cent drop off from subscribers who come in because the paper has been improved.

And so as I said, it was mighty sweet music to me to hear my circulation manager proposing as a means of getting more circulation, not some new premium, not some prize, but pepping up the sport page.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

THE column which F. P. A. conducts for the New York World is too well-known among newspaper men to require any description. It is famous not only for the work of its conductor but also for the work of its numerous contributors.

In "The Conning Tower Book" (Macy-Masius, publisher) F. P. A. himself has brought together a collection of the best verses contributed to his column during the past 20 years. While most of the selections are from his columns printed in the New York World, he has not hesitated to draw upon contributions printed in his column when he was on the New York Tribune and also on the New York Evening Mail.

A foreword is contributed by Mr. Adams. In it he speaks of his work as a column conductor as follows:

> It is a source of daily wonder, the columnist's morning mail. For it is the mail, more than anything else, that makes the columnist's job a delight, romantic adventure instead of an irksome duty. It is gambling, and gambling on velvet. There may be nothing in the mail that is worth slitting an envelope for; there may be anything from anybody from anywhere. Why the contributor contributes is what most theorists, especially most contributors, want to know. I know, for I too have lived in that Arcadia; I too have known what it was to get up at five o'clock in the morning (those were the days when a morning paper was a morning paper, and not a thing that you could buy on the street at nine in the evening) and wait for the paper to be delivered, to see whether I had made the column (B. L. T.'s, then was, in the Chicago Tribune). And I have accepted and thrown away many contributions. It is, first of all, vanity that makes the contributor send in, for no monetary reward, his material. Vanity, it is true, with many modifications and inflections; but still vanity. If the column is a proving ground, a tournament field, where the challenge is eternal, continuous. And when Morrie or Flaccus or Nickles or A. X. M. sees a paragraph or a poem in Monday's column, he can hardly wait until Tuesday's paper is published, that his own or paragraph, better, more adroit, wiser, thinner, or bitterer, may appear. A's ballade on Tuesday was well enough, but wait until B—and the rest of that crowd—sees my chant until Wednesday! C landed three times last week; I'll land five times this week.

In this foreword Mr. Adams lists a great advantage of newspaper publication. If a man sends a contribution to a newspaper he may see his work in type the next day, whereas if he sends it to the literary periodical he may have to wait from ten days to two years before it—and what is still more important, his friends—may see it. Incidentally, Mr. Adams also mentions the tricks that are played upon column conductors by professional writers who send good stuff under assumed names just to see whether the conductor knows good material when it comes through the mail. On this matter Mr. Adams adds:

> Never consciously have I printed anything that carried a big or a well-known name merely on that account; and never have I thrown out a professional writer's good (good in my opinion) stuff that was signed with another name or initials.

The book opens with "Ballade of Ink," by Ted Robinson, a w. k. newspaper man of Cleveland—also a column conductor. It is not so long but that it may be found for it in this connection:

> You are a genius, F. P. A.,
> And I, a mere columnar guy.
> You have your, what you might call, way—
> How in S. H. do I get by?
> I have a leave to stall and lie,
> And my untruths do please His Nibs
> The Editor—what boots it? Fie!
> I would I had your good contribs.
> I would that on the morrow-day,
> When I of fresh-caught wit am shy,
> Some, now, GaSook, like G. S. K.,
> Might score me with a well-placed fly.
> 'Tis dinner time—yet, though I try
> Full feverish for flights and fibs,
> I'm late for soup—nay, e'en for pie!
> I would I had your good contribs!
> Lay late, considering a lay:
> And so to breakfast on a dry
> Indifferent omelette, where I pray
> My wife with Mistress A. to vie,
> And do my stint: but she doth cry
> And say, poor wretch, e'en now her ribs
> Show, with the c. of l. so high.
> I would I had your good contribs!
> I've one whose stuff is far from dry,
> But I suspect the fellow cribs.
> Now you've gained me—but what gain I?
> I would I had your GOOD contribs!

The follow-up story is always rather pronounced in a newspaper column. Usually the first story is a quatrain to which first one contributor and then another adds his or her four lines. A good illustration may be found on page 20 headed "To Be Continued." The conclusion as given on page 22 follows:

> Said A. E. M. to F. P. A.:
> "Are these things going to run alway?"
> "No, this may be the last of them,"
> Said F. P. A. to
> A. E. M.

For the readers of this paper one of the best contributions is "A Copyreader's Dream of Fair Women" by Long John Silver (page 117). Its opening stanza is:

> I dreamed I read from off the city wire
> Legends of fair women, in deep wce
> Twanged on the hungry space-writer's brass lyre
> To cop some bootleg dough.

The remaining stanzas give the story in detail—with appropriate heads.

A glance at the contributors listed on the jacket reveals the names of many members of the working press. That fact may explain the newspaper flavor found throughout the volume. It is one safe bet that any review copy regardless to whom it may be addressed will be kept by the first reader—unless he is found out by the boss.

A COMPETITOR for EDITOR & PUBLISHER has appeared in Tokio, Japan. Number 1 bears the date of Jan. 31, 1926. A fairly accurate translation of the title is Journal for the Scientific Study of Journalism.

The contents of the first issue deal with the dualistic principle of journalism, the relations that should exist between the state and the press, a discussion of the new press laws in Italy, a description of the technical courses in journalism offered at German universities, and a survey of the influence of the radio on the press.

The editor of this technical trade paper of Japan is Dr. H. Ono. I am going to take the chance of speaking not only for myself but also for EDITOR & PUBLISHER in sending best wishes to the sister sheet in Japan.

CATHERINE BRODY has covered exceptionally well her assignment "Newspaper Girls" in the American Mercury for March. She finds that newspaper men do not make any distinction between borrowing from a man and from a woman, "except that a woman usually has less money to lend." On another matter she finds a sharp distinction drawn—when it comes to borrowing tobacco for the pipe or a cigarette from the case. On this point she says:

> Inside his shop, indeed, the most hardboiled newspaper man is still a knight in shining armor, self-appointed to save lovely woman from the perils of the news assignment, and if necessary, from herself. She may smoke anywhere else without any protest from him, but in the city room—mark the Unwritten Law—she may not smoke because it gives the place an indecent look! (except from the secret code of morals of the New York World). As a liberated woman, she may, in theory, go anywhere she wishes at any hour she wishes, but in the city room hearken to the humane policy of the New York Times as outlined by Mr. Carr Van Anda to a woman job-hunter: "It is the policy of this paper not to hire women for work which will keep them out late at night." Every city editor echoes him: "I can send a man anywhere, but there are places where a woman can't be sent, and stories that a woman can't cover."

Somewhat in detail she replies to Mr. Van Anda by relating some experiences of newspaper women. She gives a few of her own while on the street in the role of Inquiring Reporter. She believes that the spectacular papers and the picture papers employ women more readily than other types and that the former treat the women on their staffs, if anything better than the men. In her opinion there is only one bona fide woman reporter who is widely known and respected—Genevieve Forbes of the Chicago Tribune.

By way of conclusion she makes this somewhat startling observation:

> However, all is not lost. I notice with admiration that the girl reporters are changing their tactics. No more stunts to win the professional respect of the city editor! They are concentrating on their appearance and attacking his susceptibility as a male.

Wants Printing Time on Dailies

Delegate R. Lindsay Gordon, of Louisa, has introduced in the House of Delegates of the Virginia General Assembly a bill which would require all newspapers sold in Virginia to show the hour and date printed in plain type on the front page. The bill provides that the time of day, the day of the month and the year of printing shall be printed conspicuously at the top of the first page, in type not smaller than 8 point. The penalty for violation would be a fine of $10 for each separate offense.

SPAULDING TELLS TASK OF SMALL DAILIES

First Aim Should Be to Give Full Measure of Service to Readers Shawnee Publisher Tells Oklahoma Press Group

The newspaper of today that is to be permanently successful must give its first thought to the subscriber, H. G. Spaulding, publisher of Shawnee (Okla.) Morning News told the Oklahoma Press Association at its recent meeting in Oklahoma City.

H. G. Spaulding

"It must give its full measure of news, entertainment and instruction from day to day. It must have character. It must adopt and follow a policy that will win the support and confidence of the people through its consistent championship of the cause of the public and the systematic and faithful detailing of the daily doings of its own people."

Discussing the up-building of a small town daily, Mr. Spaulding said in part:

"The newspaper that carries news and reading matter very largely to give an excuse for carrying a large volume of advertising is doomed to early decay, for no newspaper that is 80 per cent advertising can command the consistent support of the reading public and is therefore compelled to resort to bargain offers and premiums to sustain a showing of a subscription list, repeating these tactics year after year.

"It is of daily newspapers in cities of the 25,000 class or of less than 10,000 circulation of which I would speak.

"But what are the prime requisites of a newspaper which will interest the people and gain a foothold eventually that will result in automatically renewing a large part of its subscription list year after year and cause subscribers to pay by the year rather than from month to month as is very largely the case with many newspapers today?

"First of all, the small city paper must not despise the methods which have been so successful with many country weeklies. They must not get the idea that the piece of news that deserves a head or that carries a date line is more important than the local or community happenings. This has been one of the main points against many of the smaller dailies.

"Like the country weekly, the small daily must print all of the little inconsequential bits of news in its circulation zone. Perchance it seeks a large rural circulation it must have correspondents in every community and in most of the important school districts.

"Your daily newspaper to appeal to your body of readers must be well-rounded. It must have the news of the community and city. It must have the major happenings of the state and the big news of the country and the world. It is absolutely essential that editorial comment and interpretative discussion be had on the main developments at home and abroad and especially in the matter of public affairs. The editorial page should also have well selected editorial comment from other newspapers, a feature article of some sort printed daily and possibly an intriguing daily skit prepared for women readers especially, something that will possess both continuity and interest.

"I believe the time has come when the daily newspapers of Oklahoma should adopt a code of ethics or standard of practice. Here are three suggestions:

"1. No Christmas bargain subscription rates.

"2. No contests or premiums.

"3. Reduce publicity to the minimum."

Wood Heads Boxing Writers

Wilbur Wood, New York Sun, was elected president of the Boxing Writers Association of New York City, recently organized society designed to bring about co-operation between the writers and the sport field they cover, such as exists in organized baseball. Other offices are Ed Van Every, New York Evening World, vice-president; James Jennings, New York Evening Graphic; Homer Thorne, Associated Press, secretary; and Samuel Taub, New York Morning Telegraph, corresponding secretary. James P. Dawson, New York Times, presided at the new organization's first meeting.

IT is not too early to get started on a column for the classified section entitled "Gifts for Easter" or "Special Easter Offers." This will allow many small advertisers to get their messages before the public at low cost.—V. G. Dawson, Halifax.

Here's an interesting advertisement recently run by the Anaheim (Cal.) Bulletin:

"WORDS OF A FEATHER—Service, Satisfaction, Results.

"The editor gathered the news—

"Our press associations telegraphed news—

"The reported brought in news—

"The linotype operators set the news—

"The proofreader corrected the errors—

"The advertising men gathered the ads—

"The ad men set the ads—

"The proofreader corrected the errors—

"The stereotyper cast the illustrations—

"The make-up men assembled it all—

"The bookkeeper made a record of it all—

"The pressmen printed 5,200 copies—

"The circulation manager counted them—

"18 carrier boys delivered them in town—

"7 automobile routes delivered them in the rural districts—

"That's what we sell you—that's what you buy when you advertise in the Anaheim Bulletin."—F. H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

"THESE FIRMS WILL EQUIP YOUR OFFICE COMPLETE" read the line over a double truck in an Indiana newspaper. Space was sold for furniture, typewriters, adding machines, check protectors, electric fans, water coolers, etc., with each firm limited to one block.—B. A. T., Springfield, Ohio.

The Los Angeles Examiner has inaugurated a weekly page appearing every Saturday (dull advertising day) under the heading "The Arts of Living." Everything contributory to finer home life, from new books to landscape gardening, and from china for the dining table to new pictures for living room walls, is discussed on the editorial section of the page by well-known local authorities. Advertisements of the merchants interested in pushing the sale of these "finer things" support the page—admirably!—M. S. M., Denver.

Real human interest is embodied in the stunt carried on by a middle-west publication. Using a double truck with ads displayed lengthwise, the space was divided into 15 boxes, each containing a description of an ad to be written. The idea was based on the fact that these merchants wanted to know the public's opinion of a good ad. A prize was offered for the best ad written for each of the 15 advertisers.—George C. Marcley.

One newspaper in Texas in a medium-sized city, has been carrying a full-page every Saturday devoted only to automobile news. A very good line of ads. is carried on it, and it proves to be a very good money-maker. As it was begun, for two weeks contests were staged for letters telling of the best buys that auto owners ever made on accessories, etc. These letters were run for two Saturdays following the contests, and in this way a hitherto new idea was changed into a profitable scheme.—Barry Bishop.

DENVER COMPANY REORGANIZED

Victor Neuhaus Withdraws From Colorado Herald Pub. Enterprise

Reorganization of the Colorado Herald Publishing Company, Denver, publishers of several weeklies, semi-weeklies and dailies has resulted in several changes.

Victor Neuhaus, pioneer foreign language newspaper publisher of Denver, has retired and will travel abroad following the complete disposal of his interest in the business.

Frank J. Wolf, former general manager and part owner of the company is now president, with Fred T. Hartman, associated for the last year with the company, as secretary-treasurer. Hartman was formerly publicity director for several Western railroads and at one time was co-owner of the old Hartman-Sargent Advertising Agency, pioneer agency of Denver.

On the mechanical side of the Colorado Herald plant, Ira C. Gwinnup, for many years owner of his own newspaper in Colorado, is now foreman of the composing room, replacing George Branish, while John Matthews, Denver, replaces Ed Howell as foreman of the newspaper's press room.

HUNCHES

ONE DOLLAR WILL BE PAID FOR EACH "HUNCH" PUBLISHED

AFTER all the limerick contest always gets big response. A new one which advertises the features the newspaper has is in the nature of a series with separate prizes for limericks about each feature the paper carries, from press service to comic strips. The idea went over big here.—H. B. Sanderson, Warren (O.) Tribune-Chronicle.

The Chicago Daily News is publishing a daily column composed of short wire stories portraying a peculiar side of life under the box "This Queer World." Some of the stories are pathetic, some humorous, but all are interesting and about unusual people and things.—Charles E. Calkins, Chicago.

If you can get estimates of attendance and receipts of theaters and other amusement places in your city and strike a total of the amount spent annually for amusement, then compare it with the amount spent annually for education, an interesting story would result.—John H. A. Kelly, Norristown, Pa.

As a circulation promotion stunt, obtain silhouettes of outstanding people in your city. Publish a silhouette one night and the name of the person the next night. The Halifax Evening Mail did this and it proved a very popular feature.—V. G. Dawson, Halifax.

With spring comes the usual building activities. Keeping in close touch with local contractors will result in many real estate page features. Facts concerning new styles in homes, costs, volume of building, etc., can be obtained.—L. E. Buchart, Brooklyn.

What's the most photographed thing in your town? A San Antonio, Tex., paper worked up a good feature on the subject by interviewing film developers at the leading kodak shops. The story revealed that thousands of snap-shots of the historic Alamo, the cradle of Texas Independence, are made each month. The reactions of the developers to the constant sight of Alamo snap-shots were interesting, as were their comments on the more popular poses of persons when they are photographed.—Royal H. Roussel.

One of the most interesting straight-away feature stories I ever obtained was from several ministers on: "What is your opinion of hell?" I interviewed eight ministers on the subject, picking one from six different orthodox churches and two from more liberal churches. The opinions varied greatly, of course.—M. V. Briggs, Duluth (Minn.) News Tribune.

Distribute in PENNSYLVANIA Then ADVERTISE

Consumer demand is determined by the requirements of a community, based on the living habits and social standards of the inhabitants. In an industrial territory, such as Pennsylvania, the demands are of sufficient variety to cover the scale of products, from the barest necessity to the greatest luxury.

A great industrial and agricultural center, Pennsylvania contains an army of well paid workers, with earning capacity sufficient to demand many varieties of merchandise beyond the necessities for creature comforts.

The Captains of Industry, their co-workers and social equals represent the greatest wealth of the nation.

Between these extremes are solid, substantial citizens, intelligent and industrious, the backbone of the Keystone State.

The Pennsylvania people live well, whatever their calling, and they read the daily newspapers. They patronize their local stores.

The local stores of Pennsylvania are well managed by discerning merchants who cater to the demands of their buying public.

Consumer demand that is created by advertising will bring people into the local stores. These merchants will not hesitate to meet this demand.

The newspaper is unquestionably the best medium for National Advertising. It offers the largest possible circulation for the amount of money spent.

The daily newspapers of Pennsylvania will supply territorial data and will cooperate in merchandising and sales promotion.

†Government Statement, Sept. 30, 1925.

NINETY-SIX PER CENT. of The Sun's total circulation is concentrated in the New York market—the City and Suburban area which both National Advertisers and Local Stores want to cover when they advertise in New York newspapers. Through this highly concentrated circulation the advertiser's message in The Sun is assured maximum effectiveness.

AMONG THE BETTER CLASS people of this territory, The Sun has a larger home circulation than any other New York weekday newspaper.

THE SUN IS A HOME NEWSPAPER. It enables advertisers to reach all members of the family six days a week. It is read by intelligent, discriminating men and women who have confidence in The Sun as a newspaper and who respond readily to the advertisements which The Sun publishes.

ADVERTISING IN THE SUN is economical. The cost of reaching 1,000 people in the New York market is lower in The Sun than in any other New York newspaper which approaches The Sun in quality of circulation.

A Powerful Sales Producer in the World's Greatest Market

TO advertisers who are seeking increased sales for 1926, the New York market —with its population of nine and a half million consumers—offers larger opportunities than any other market in the world.

All indications point to an unusually profitable business year in this great market. There is employment for everyone. Bank savings are high. The construction of new buildings has broken all records. Retail sales have reached new heights.

There are more people with more money to spend in New York to-day than in any other market in the world.

Concerns merchandising products of good quality can develop the unparalleled sales opportunities in New York most effectively and most economically through the advertising columns of The Sun.

The large number of prominent advertisers, both National and Local, who are now selling their products in New York through The Sun, the tremendous volume of advertising which manufacturers and merchants place in The Sun year after year, and the exceptional gains in advertising which The Sun has made during the last year—all bear convincing testimony to the productiveness of advertising in The Sun.

The Department Stores of Manhattan—keen, experienced judges of the selling power of the various New York newspapers—advertise more in The Sun than in any other New York newspaper. Advertisers in all lines, who want to increase their sales in New York, can profitably follow the example of these Department Stores.

The Sun's superior ability to produce results for advertisers is based on its large high class and unusually responsive circulation, which is attributable in turn to the high character of The Sun as a newspaper.

THE NEWS carried less lineage than any other New York newspaper for the twelve months of 1925 . . .

NOT because we couldn't get more, but because we couldn't print more in our tabloid paper . . . Only 4.1% of all the advertising run in seventeen New York and Brooklyn newspapers in the twelve months of 1925 appeared in The News—6,832,472 lines of the 163,904,994 total! . . . THERE is no more significant fact to national advertisers in New York . . . than the exclusive limited presentation of the advertising message that this paper makes possible. The six million odd lines in The News were delivered to the largest daily circulation in America—delivered in a small package and in an assimilable form. . . . Every advertisement in The News had its chance to sell. . . . Every agate line on the small page came before the eyes of the whole News circulation—the largest daily circulation in America. . . . . Every issue was an advertising salvo instead of a daily barrage. . . . GETTING copy into a paper isn't advertising necessarily, but getting copy into a reader's eyes is!

These Iowa Daily Newspapers have pledged themselves to the "Iowa Plan"—a unique way of obtaining uniform co-operation for worthwhile advertisers.

If your sales need increasing—try Iowa. We will help you.

Iowa people prefer Daily Newspapers

TO begin with, Iowa has a smaller percentage of illiteracy than any other state in the union.

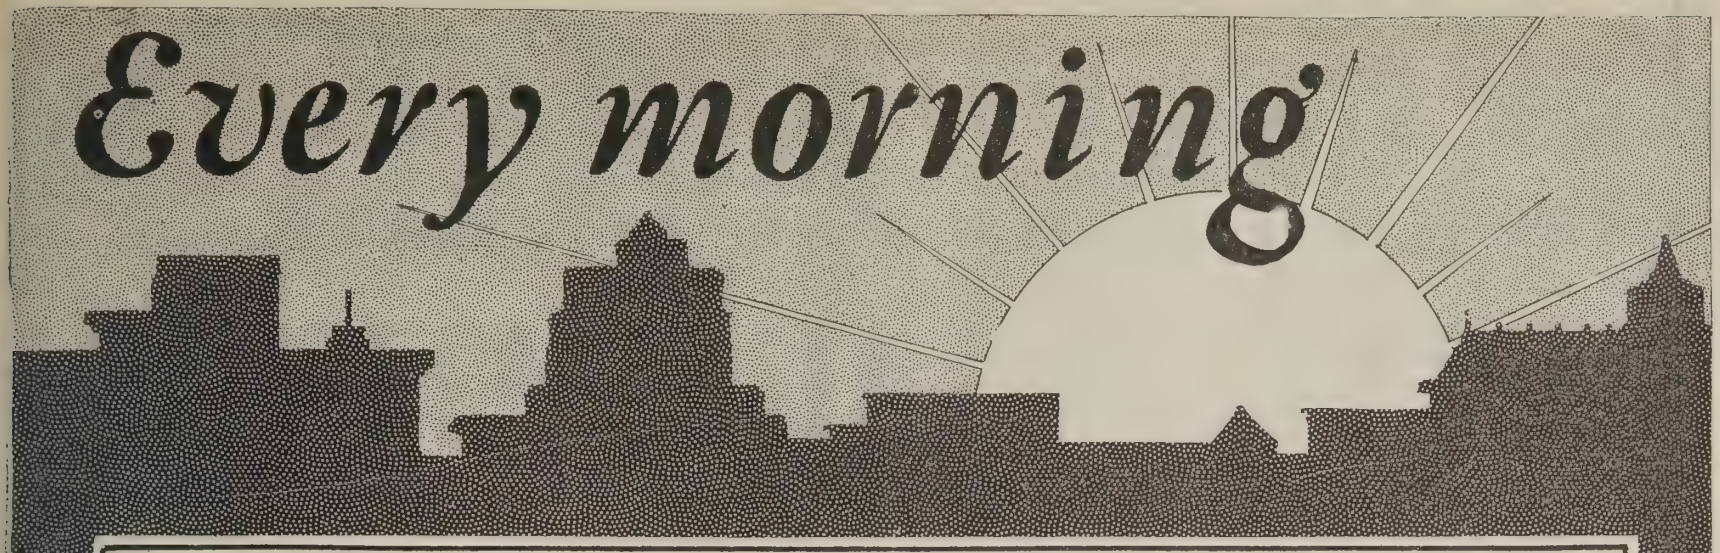
And mark this well: Practically every family in Iowa—on the farms as well as in town and city—takes a daily Iowa newspaper. (550,000 Families in Iowa. These 28 Iowa dailies have combined circulation of 571,151.)

Altogether Iowans pay nearly three and a half million dollars yearly in subscriptions for these 28 Iowa daily and Sunday newspapers.

This exceeds the total amount they spend for any other two or three classes of publications combined.

Clearly then, the place for the advertiser who is selling in this state, or expects to do so, is in the daily Iowa newspapers.

For they are the media which Iowa's 2,400,000 intelligent people read and prefer.



Place your own advertising in the daily Iowa newspapers and watch it begin to get the results you want!

Selling Automobiles pays in PHILADELPHIA

Federal Reserve figures for the Philadelphia district indicate that far fewer automobiles are purchased on the instalment plan than is popularly supposed.

Employment in the Philadelphia area is general and pay envelopes contain more than last year owing to increased output of the many different manufacturing plants in this district.

Where and when people have the cash is the place and time to advertise automobiles, and from every view of the business barometer, Philadelphia now is a good place.

In Year 227 National Advertisers Invested $70,000,000 in Newspaper Space

Estimates Compiled for 1925 by the A. N. P. A. Bureau Proves Impressive Leadership of Press Medium—Economics Influenced Trend to Papers, Thomson Finds

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

A GROUP of only 227 national advertisers invested $73,994,000 in newspapers space during 1925, according to estimates prepared by the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and published herewith for the first time in the advertising trade press.

WILLIAM A. THOMSON

Of this incomplete group 17 had estimated appropriations last year of a million dollars or more. Led by the Ford Motor Car Company, Detroit, with $2,500,000, including dealer expenditures, the million-dollar advertisers are:

American Tobacco Company, $1,700,000; Bayer Company, makers of Aspirin, $1,000,000; Calumet Baking Powder Company, $1,275,000; Chevrolet Motors, $1,500,000, including dealer space; Dodge Brothers, Inc., $1,500,000; Kellogg Company, $1,500,000; Lever Brothers, $1,750,000; Liggett & Myers Tobacco Company, $1,750,000; Literary Digest, $1,150,000; P. Lorillard Company, $1,150,000; McFadden Publications, $1,100,000; Maytag Company, $1,000,000, including dealer space; Paige Detroit Motor Car Company, $1,100,000; Standard Oil Company of Indiana, $1,275,000; Studebaker Corporation, $2,000,000; William Wrigley, Jr. & Co., $1,250,000.

Newspaper advertising investments of this group of 17 totals $21,455,000, or more than one-third of the grand total of those listed. It will be noted five of the 17 are manufacturers of automobiles, three of tobacco manufacturers, and two represent the magazine field. Two magazine publishers invested $2,260,000 to attract readers and advertising matter to their media.

"An impressive picture of the leadership of newspapers as national advertising media" is the way William A. Thomson, director of the Bureau of Advertising, describes the list of 227 users of newspaper space and their 1925 expenditures.

Mr. Thomson, in an interview, analyzed the list and pointed out economic reasons for the increased use of newspaper advertising.

The constant discussion by economic experts outside the advertising field, such as Herbert Hoover, he pointed out, has occasioned a closer study of markets and buying power on the part of the advertiser. As a result, he said, the need for intensive consumer advertising, which the newspaper offers, has been increasingly disclosed.

"The modern advertiser," Mr. Thomson declared, "can no longer be satisfied with merely making a gesture toward national advertising, such as he might have done a few years ago—a flash in the magazines, or a flash on the billboards.

"A change in buying power has occurred, as indicated, for instance, in the increased business done on the installment plan. Seventy-five per cent of the automobiles bought in this country are purchased on the installment plan. There are nearly twice as many automobile owners as there are income tax payers.

"Magazine publishers frequently make the claim they reach the income tax payers. Even though this may be true, and it seems absurd, there is a potential market outside the income tax list which the national advertiser is bound to cover.

"Newspapers enjoy the unique position of reaching the income tax payers as well as the non-income tax payers. Vastly more important than the income tax payers is the large army of wage earners. This army looms in larger importance than ever before.

"After all, everybody who reads, reads a newspaper. That takes in everyone who buys.

"Ten years ago the newspapers doubtless represented some waste in volume of circulation. Today, because of the growth in buying power and the wider potential buying market, this waste in newspaper circulation has been reduced to a negligible amount.

"The modern advertiser is taking cognizance of this fact. He knows now it is more than ever worth while to go after the all inclusive buying power of the newspapers, because of the change in modern buying habits."

Mr. Thomson, discussing the list of 227 advertisers, emphasized the fact that the table does not mean the leaders in the use of newspaper space.

"Through a system with which we are experimenting this year," he said, "and by which we will receive monthly reports from all states and Canada concerning the national advertisers who have used newspaper columns, we expect to be able by the end of 1926 to estimate the expenditures of every prominent national newspaper advertiser.

"In the present list there are several points worthy of study. For one thing it represents the names of many advertisers which have become nationally known through newspaper copy. A great many are popularly supposed to be spending enormous sums in newspaper space, and yet when you see what they actually spent you cannot help but be more than ever impressed by the power of the newspaper medium. One sees a great number of popular products with comparatively modest appropriations.

"The newcomers on the list also represent an interesting study. A great many concerns which a few years ago were not generally known as newspaper advertisers now appear to be spending substantial sums of money in the daily and weekly newspaper press."

Mr. Thomson in conclusion declared himself pleased with the progress made by the bureau in compiling lists such as the one now published since the service was first begun in 1924.

"In the past," he declared, "our estimates have been regarded as being almost wholly accurate. We trust the same will prove true of this group of estimates."

The Bureau prefaces publication of the list in its current membership bulletin with the following:

"Starting in 1924, the Bureau undertook the big task of compiling this information owing to the insistent demands from many factors interested in advertising.

"Figures showing how much money various firms spent in magazine advertising had long been available each year.

"The Bureau believed that information of a similar nature covering the newspaper field was equally important and with this in view undertook an investigation of the 1923 expenditures with the result that in November, 1924, it was able to print 62 estimates running from $100,000 to $1,700,000.

"Last year we were able to offer 100 estimates of 1924 accounts running from $100,000 to $2,000,000.

"In the present compilation covering 1925 expenditures we have included certain expenditures from a minimum of $50,000 feeling that the work should be broadened in the direction of including firms spending less than $100,000, which was the former minimum considered.

"It will be noted that there are 44 advertisers included here who spent $50,000 or more but less than $100,000.

"It will also be noted that several firms whose advertising was estimated last year have not yet been included in the compilation. The Bureau expects to add most of these names later and to supplement the list from time to time as the estimates are completed."

LARGE USERS OF NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING

HEREWITH is presented a list of 227 national newspaper advertisers who invested $50,000 or more each in newspaper space during 1925, according to estimates prepared by the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

The list represents only a portion of the great army of national newspaper advertisers. In virtually every classification from the minimum of $50,000 to the maximum of $2,500,000 there are many advertisers whose expenditures have not yet been computed.

ST. JOSEPH GAZETTE SOLD TO LEVAND

Former Casper (Wyo.) Herald Publisher Enters Missouri Field—Price Set at $125,000—Sam Day Named M. E.

The St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette was sold March 5, for $125,000 to Max M. Levand, former owner of the Casper (Wyo.) Herald and Salt Creek Journal and one time manager of the Kansas City Post. Purchase was made from Francis Ford, president of the First Trust Company who had bid it in two weeks ago at a trustee's sale.

MAX LEVAND

"The Gazette will be conducted as an independent newspaper supporting those candidates best for the city," Mr. Levand told EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "It will be conducted along the lines of a people's newspaper."

Sam H. Day of the Miami (Fla.) Herald staff and formerly managing editor of the Casper Herald, has been named managing editor, and Homer Watkins, formerly circulation manager of the Herald, has been appointed circulation manager.

Many new features and a four-page Sunday comic will be added, Mr. Levand stated. He also said the Gazette will be moved into a new building within three months and equipped with much new machinery.

A charter was issued March 6, by Secretary of State Becker to the Gazette Publishing Company.

The company has a capital of $250,000, all paid up in money and property. It is divided into 2500 shares of $100 par value each and held as follows:

M. M. Levand, 2479; Frank M. Lowe of Kansas City, 20, and H. Roe Bartle of St. Joseph, 1.

The articles set out that the capital consists of $75,000, paid in cash and property as follows:

Plant and mechanical equipment, $85,000; good will, $40,000; franchise in Associated Press, lease on building and subscription list, $50,000.

Mr. Levand is 32 years old. For eight years he was general manager of the Kansas City Post prior to its purchase by Walter Dickey.

BUY-AT-HOME DRIVE URGED

Norristown, Pa., Merchants Group Seeking to Raise $500,000 Fund

Officers of the Norristown (Pa.) Merchants Association Inc., have started a general movement to increase buying at home, and, as part of its program, is calling on various business organizations throughout the country with a view to raising a $500,000 general promotion fund to advertise the project. The group conducted a successful local campaign to have the home-town dollar spent at home.

In announcing its plan to organizations totaling about 500,000 members, the association says that "in Norristown we have made effective use of advertising and the cooperation of the schools, banks and industries in our campaign. To mold public opinion throughout the United States by use of magazines and other agencies will require a large initial investment. Our immediate goal is $500,000.

"To insure proper use of the funds, we have decided that no moneys be spent before submitting the purpose of the expenditure to the participating members. The Montgomery Trust Company of Norristown, a member of the Federal Reserve System and one of our strongest institutions, is treasurer of this fund."

The announcement points out that the proposed campaign will have for its object not only bringing out how much better the home merchant can serve the consumer than outside agencies, but educating the public to the benefits of home shopping to the general community. Jacob Schorr is president of the association.

ELGIN DAILY BUYS BUILDING

Courier-News to Take Over City's Biggest Block for Home

The Elgin (Ill.) Courier-News, of which D. A. McKenzie is editor and publisher, has purchased the Spurling Building, largest business block in the city, and will take possession of it the first of next month.

The building will ultimately be remodeled as the new home of the newspaper. The exact date of occupancy has not yet been determined.

Plans have been suggested for remodeling the basement, first and second floors into modern newspaper offices. The third, fourth and fifth floors will not be used by the newspaper plant.

Crosswords Still Interest Readers

The Madison (Wis.) Capital Times recently decided interest in crossword puzzles had languished and dropped that feature. So many letters and telephone calls were received from subscribers that the puzzle was reinstated after three days' absence from the paper.

EAST AND MIDDLE WEST CIRCULATORS MEET

Ninth Annual Gathering of Interstate Association in Reading, Pa., March 16—Western Group Meeting in Tulsa, Okla., Same Date

Circulation managers in two different sections of the country will meet March 16 and 17, to discuss problems of the subscription side of the newspaper business. The Interstate Circulation Managers' Association is scheduled to hold its ninth annual convention in Reading, Pa., and the semi-annual meeting of the Mid-West Circulation Managers' Association will be held at Tulsa, Okla.

The latter association consists of members from newspapers in Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, and Oklahoma. E. E. Scott, Tulsa World, is chairman of the entertainment committee and J. V. Hollett, Tulsa Tribune, chairman of the program committee.

As announced this week by J. H. Kuntz, Altoona (Pa.) Tribune, the Interstate association members will be addressed by the following:

Murray C. Beck, Lancaster (Pa.) New Era; E. S. Dobson, Brooklyn (N. Y.) Times; John Foley, Mt. Carmel (Pa.) Item; C. H. Deininger, Allentown (Pa.) Chronicle-News; Oliver J. Keller, Lancaster New Era; Hugh O'Donnell, assistant business manager, New York Times; J. M. Annenberg, Philadelphia Public Ledger; Frank O. Williams, Scranton (Pa.) Republican, and Nelson S. Rounsley, Harrisburg (Pa.) Telegraph.

C. T. Buck, Scranton Republican, and association president will preside.

TROTSKY TURNS TO TEACHING

Accepts Professorship Offered by Moscow School of Journalism

Leon Trotsky has accepted a professorship offered by the Moscow School of Journalism, declaring he has found Soviet journalism lacking in "pep."

He will lecture on the following themes: Chief diseases of the press and their cures; newspaper information; publicity material; newspaper language and style; contact with the reader and study of the reader's interests; and training worker and peasant correspondents.

When in New York in 1917, Trotsky worked on the Novy Mir, Russian newspaper.

Dailies Ask A. B. C. Membership

The Klamath Falls (Ore.) Evening Herald and the Klamath News of that city have both applied for membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulation.

DEALEY BUYS DALLAS NEWS FOR $2,725,000

President and General Manager, with Sons, Acquires Controlling Interest in A. H. Belo & Co., Vesting Ownership in Men Who Have Built Organization—G. B. Dealey 52 Years in Newspaper Business

GEORGE B. DEALEY, president, has purchased control of A. H. Belo & Co., publishers of the Dallas Morning News, Dallas Journal, Dallas Semi-Weekly Farm News and the Texas Almanac, properties valued at $2,725,000. Associated with him in the transfer are his sons, Walter A. and Edward M., long members of the organization, the management of which has been in Mr. Dealey's hands since its establishment in 1885.

The transfer means reorganization of the company, with control in the hands of the active management, instead of, as formerly, held by the Belo family and descendants of men once connected with the firm.

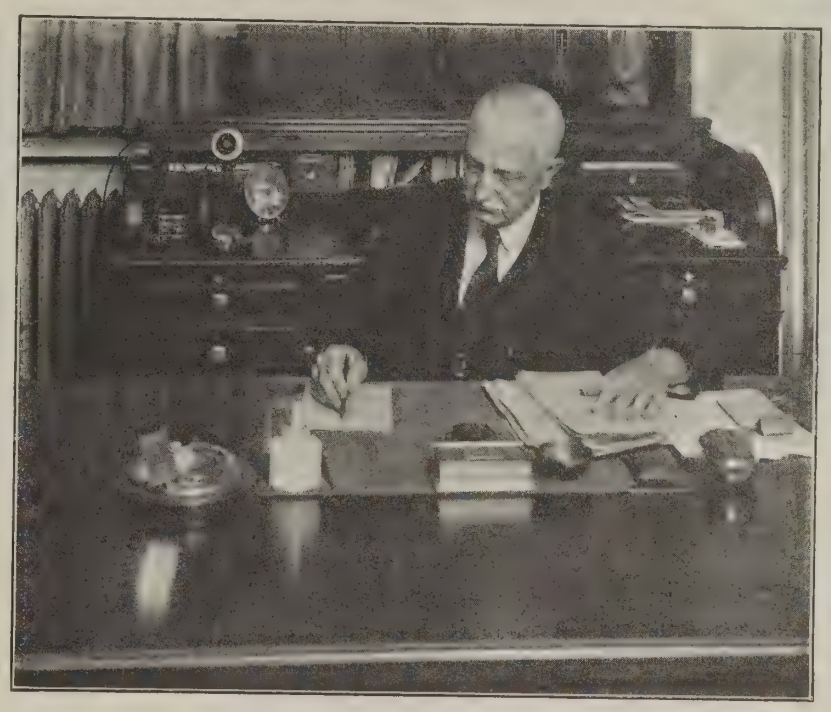
Details of the deal, which concerns one of the most influential, stable and prosperous newspaper properties in the country, are contained in the following statement issued in Dallas this week:

"A plan for the reorganization of A. H. Belo & Co., Texas' oldest newspaper publishing company, was made public this week and will be put into operation in the near future. It has received the approval of more than the requisite stock of the company.

"This company now publishes the Dallas Morning News, the Dallas Journal, a six day afternoon newspaper, the Dallas Semi-Weekly Farm News, and the Texas Almanac. Until 1923, it published the Galveston Daily News, Texas' oldest newspaper, established in 1842.

"The Belo newspapers are institutions of the State of Texas and of the Southwest. The management has spent a lifetime in upholding the high ideals of these papers; and, in truth, the primary purpose of the reorganization is the continued and permanent maintenance of these ideals.

"George B. Dealey, now president of the company, and serving actively his fifty-second consecutive year, will hold a majority of the voting stock of the reorganized company. Mr. Dealey began as office boy in the Galveston News on Oct. 12, 1874; subsequently he served as foreman of the mailing department, then, in 1883-84 as special traveling agent, next as correspondent of the Galveston News at Dallas, then as manager of the Waco and Houston branch offices. In the summer of 1885 he was sent to Dallas to assist in the establishment of the Dallas News and he became its first business manager on Oct. 1, 1885. In 1906 he was elected vice-president and in 1919 he was made president. He has the title also of general manager, which title he has long held.



"His sons, Walter A. and Edward M., are closely associated in the management. They are the fifth generation of the family to devote themselves to newspaper work.

"Mr. Dealey is perhaps the best known publisher in the Southwest. He has for a great many years been a leader in civic and philanthropic affairs. He is the recognized father of the City Plan movement in Texas, being primarily responsible for its development in Dallas and for the employment of George E. Kessler by the city of Dallas in 1910.

"Mr. Dealey is a 33rd degree (Hon.) Scottish Rite Freemason, Knight Templar, a Shriner, and chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Westminster Presbyterian Church.

"Originally the stock of A. H. Belo & Co. was entirely owned by its management. Now, to the extent of perhaps four-fifths or more, it is owned by the widows, children and legal representatives of men once directly conected with the company. Substantially two-thirds of the stock of the present company is owned by members of the Belo family.

"This family now consists of Mrs. Charles Peabody of Cambridge, Mass., daughter of Col. A. H. Belo; her two daughters, Mrs. Le Grand Cannon, of New Haven, Conn., and Miss Caryl Peabody; her son, Alfred H. Belo Peabody, now a student at Yale; Mrs. A. H. Belo, Jr., of Dallas, the widow of A. H. Belo, Jr., the son and successor of Col. A. H. Belo, and her two daughters, Mrs. Allen T. Morrison, of Asheville, N. C., and Mrs. George Biddle, of Philadelphia.

George B. Dealey

"These and other holders of relatively large blocks of stock have come to the realization that a reorganization whereby the control of the company will be vested in those active in the management of the property, is for the best interests of the company. Accordingly, a plan of reorganization has been worked out and submitted to the stockholders to accomplish these results.

"A. H. Belo & Co., the corporation, dates back to 1881. Prior to that date it was a partnership. The capital stock, for many years, was $300,000. This was increased in 1921 to $1,500,000, by a stock dividend. The present value has been fixed in the reorganization at $2,725,000. Aiding in the determination of this value were Don C. Seitz, formerly of the New York World, now with the Outlook, S. P. Weston, newspaper engineer of New York, and James W. Brown, publisher of EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

"The plan contemplates the exchange of the stock of the present company for securities of the reorganized company. The voting stock will be held by Mr. Dealey and a few other members of the organization active in the management. Mr. Dealey will own the majority of this stock.

"Details of the financial plan and of the securities to be issued will be announced later.

"Owen D. Young, chairman of the Board of Directors of the General Electric Company, and Ennis Cargill, of Houston, acted as advisers for the Belo family and the management in the construction of the financial plan. Legal advisers of the Belo family were Baker, Botts, Parker and Garwood, of Houston, Tex.

George Waverley Briggs, trust officer and vice-president of the City National Bank of Dallas, acted as adviser for Mr. Dealey and his associates; legal advisers were Locke and Locke of Dallas. The City National Bank of Dallas is acting as depository.

Mr. Dealey began his service with this publishing concern on Oct. 12, 1874, at the age of 14 as office boy. Forty-five years later he was elected to the presidency of the institution after it had many times multiplied in plant, personnel and volume of business. His was a steady climb, not a meteoric flight. He went upward step by step, missing none; step by step, steadily. When he had gotten to the top, the employes staged a celebration. In responding to the felicitations of the occasion, Mr. Dealey said:

"My attainment to my present place is not so much due to any perfection in me as to the fact that I stuck to the job, and that is the advice that I would give to others. Always stick to the job."

Upon other occasions Mr. Dealey has referred to the fact that never since he has been connected with the Dallas News has he been offered a position with another paper.

"This," he has said, "I account an honor, for it has indicated a wide realization of the fact that I had a good job and was satisfied with it."

Mr. Dealey began his newspaper career with the Galveston Daily News, 32 years after that newspaper had been launched back in the days of the Texan Republic, and at a time when it was owned by the firm of Richardson, Belo & Co.

He stayed in that job of office boy, collector, etc., for some six years, during which time, to paraphrase Pinafore,

"He polished them up so spic and spang,
That they made him the ruler of the whole she-bang."

That is to say, in those office boy days he laid the foundation for his rise to the top. The promotions began in 1880, when he was made foreman of the mailing department. Soon thereafter, in this position, he had the honor of explaining the workings of his department to former President U. S. Grant, who was on his trip around the world.

About the same time, young Dealey had an opportunity to render an unusual service, and he did it. Houston had laid a yellow fever quarantine against Galveston. The Galveston News' gateway to most of the state was through Houston, which it reached over the line of the old Galveston, Houston & Henderson Railroad.

With this gateway closed, the Galveston News was bottled up. But the cork was pulled in this way: The Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Railway was then under construction from Galveston northwestwardly, its end-of-track then being at Alvin, some 18 miles out. The News was sent out on that line to Alvin, from which point it was forwarded by wagon to rail connections a few miles outside the limits of Houston. That was the first time the Santa Fe carried the United States mails, and young Dealey, duly sworn in as a post-office employee, was in charge.

It was about this time that a big change had come in the affairs of the Galveston News. Colonel A. H. Belo in 1875 had acquired the interests of Willard Richardson in the property. In 1881, the business was incorporated under the title of A. H. Belo & Co.

It was not long until a change of larger import came, and for it Mr. Dealey went in training. This was the founding of the Dallas Morning News. That venture, without precedent was in contemplation as early as 1883. Mr. Dealey was sent all over northern Texas visiting nearly every town of consequence, to estimate the probable circulation of the Dallas News if started. This trip occupied several months. Then, successively he served as a regular traveling agent for the News, as agent and correspondent at Waco, and as head of the Houston bureau. Finally, in the Summer of 1884, he was located in Dallas as the business manager of the Dallas Morning News, which it had been determined to start on Oct. 1 of that year.

For a little more than 20 years he continued in that position of business manager, directing a very successful and steadily growing business. Early in 1906 he was elected to the office of vice-president and general manager of the corporation, and early in 1919 to the office of president. In March of 1922 the corporation sold the Galveston News to W. L. Moody, Jr., of Galveston, in order to concentrate attention upon its Dallas publications.

Mr. Dealey was born in Manchester, England, Sept. 18, 1859, and came to the United States with his parents in 1870. He had attended the primary schools in Liverpool, and in Galveston he attended the public schools and also a night school. Before entering the service of the News he had worked in a number of business houses in Galveston. He was married on April 9, 1884, to Olivia Allen, of Lexington, Mo. They have five children, three daughters and two sons.

THEY WANT TO COME HOME

Three "Lost" Correspondents Still Waiting to Report Arica Plebiscite

Harry Frantz, United Press staff correspondent, sent to Arica, Chile, to report the Tacna-Arica plebiscite, writes in a letter received this week by Karl A. Bickel, U. P. president, that he is the world's lost newspaper man, who wants very much to come home.

Also "lost" with Frantz are M. Cortesi, Associated Press, and Gerald Martin, Chicago Tribune. They have been marooned since last August, when they arrived in Chile expecting to return to this country within a month or two. Now the plebiscite is expected to take place in April. But it has been postponed so many times!

Arica, a town of about 3,000, lies in the heart of a 200 mile stretch of barren ground. Watching the listless tides of the Pacific, commenting on the heat, and visiting an occasional moving picture aboard the U. S. S. Denver, are the chief amusements offered the newspaper men, Frantz stated.

Fire Destroys Georgia Plant

The building and plant of the Jesup (Ga.) Sentinel was destroyed by fire March 2. Sam Kallenbaurgh is editor. The paper had everything in readiness to issue a 40-page edition.

BOSTON WRITER STRUCK BY CONGRESSMAN

Robert B. Choate Slapped by Rep. Upshaw After Latter Charges He Was Made Out "A Faker" In News Story

Robert B. Choate, Washington correspondent for the Boston Herald, was attacked in the lobby of the United States House of Representatives on Saturday, March 6, by Congressman William David Upshaw, of Atlanta, Georgia, after the Congressman demanded that the newspaper reporter repudiate his report in his newspaper of the Congressman's pro-prohibition address in the House on Thursday (March 4).

Choate was summoned from the House Press Gallery to the House lobby by the Congressman. Upshaw led Choate to the newspaper files kept for members of the House. He dug into the file of the Boston Herald. He pointed to this paragraph in Choate's story:

"By way of interpolation it should be explained that Representative Upshaw uses crutches. Whenever excited, as today in the House, he totally discards their use and runs about as well as any other man."

Upshaw told Choate he had written a "lie." Choate replied that any member of the House Press Gallery who observed Upshaw "in action" on Thursday certainly formed the impression that Upshaw could do without his crutches "in moments of excitement." Upshaw insisted he could not do without his crutches. He drew attention to the biographical sketch of himself printed in the latest issue of the Congressional Directory in which it is stated his spine was injured by a fall as a farm boy and he spent seven years in bed.

"You are making me out as a faker," shouted Upshaw at the end of ten minutes' heated conversation with Choate during which he failed to force the Boston newspaperman to agree that his story was "wrong."

"As long as you force me to say so, I do regard you as a faker," was Choate's response.

The Congressman released one of his crutches. He swung at Choate with one hand. He missed Choate's face and struck him across the head and behind one ear. Choate thrust his hands in his coat pockets and stood glaring at Upshaw.

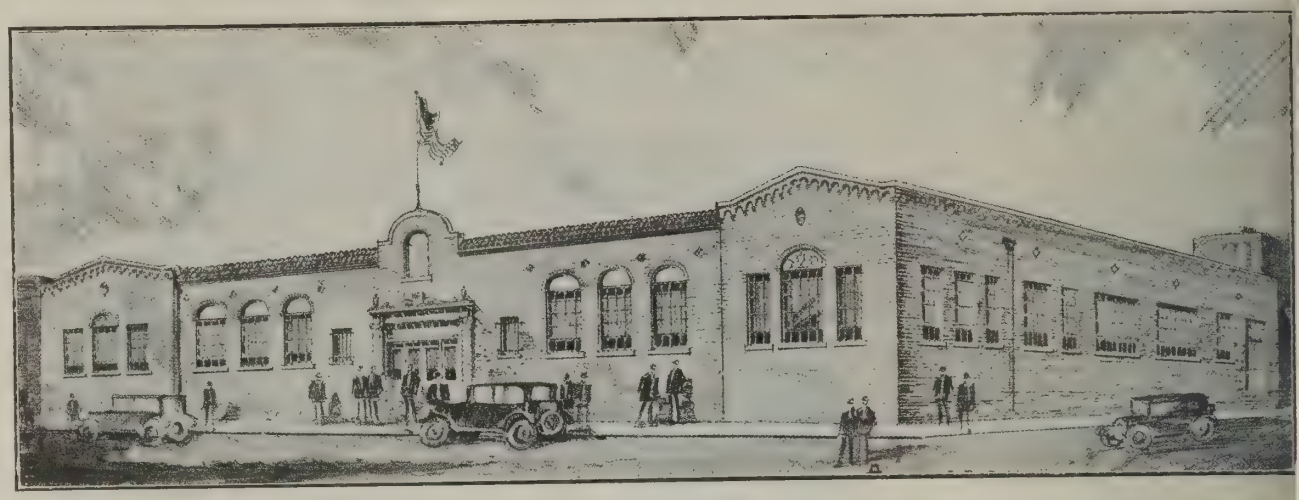
Theodore Tiller, Washington correspondent for the Atlanta Journal, was seated nearby with other members of the Georgia delegation. The Georgians bore down upon Upshaw and hustled him away before he could strike Choate again.

Upshaw issued a statement later in which he apologized for "slapping" Choate and announced he would "pray" for him. He also declared he would waive "all Congressional immunity" in the matter.

Huge Switchboard for Denver Post

Installation of what is said to be the largest private branch telephone exchange in the west has just been completed at the Denver Post plant. The new exchange is a multiple-type "600 C" capable of handling 12,000 telephone calls a day. According to telephone company figures, an average of 4,000 and a maximum of 7,000 telephone calls a day are handled by the Post.

A. A. C. W. HITS FREE MAIL



Advertising Clubs Want Government Departments to Pay

A resolution has been adopted by the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, through its executive committee, asking that the free mailing privilege of Government departments be abolished.

The association believes that postal deficits are created by the expense of handling free, the mass of material sent out by departments and that mailing costs should be a part of the regular expenses of all departments. The resolution asks that mailing costs be paid out of the General Treasury instead of being carried by the Postal Department.

A copy of the resolution has been sent to the Joint Congressional Committee which now has under consideration revision of postal rates.

NEW $75,000 PLANT BEING BUILT FOR FT. WORTH PRESS

Above is an architect's drawing of the new home of the Fort Worth (Tex.) Press, now under construction, and which will be ready for occupancy by that newspaper May 1. The new plant will give the Press 11,000 square feet of floor space. The building will be of steel and concrete construction, with footings to carry two extra stories. Total cost will approximate $75,000, according to Ward C. Mayborn, general business manager for the Southwest group of Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

HOUSTON DAILY OPENS OFFICE SKYSCRAPER

Twenty-Two Story Downtown Building of Post-Dispatch Completed—Cost $2,000,000 And Will House Business Departments

R. S. Sterling, chairman of the board of the Houston Post-Dispatch, on Wednesday of last week formally opened the new 22-story $2,000,000 Post-Dispatch office building.

Commemorating the event the Post-Dispatch issued an edition of several sections, on the first page of one section of which appeared photographs of eleven executives and directors of the paper's business departments, which will be quartered in the new structure.

The new office building towers 315 feet above the street level. It has 160,470 feet of floor space and 519 offices. Sumptuous quarters have been provided on the 22nd floor for the Post-Dispatch's broadcasting station KPRC. The local U. S. Weather Bureau is located on the roof.

The building was completed in 11 months' time.

PENNY PAPER BACK

Brooklyn Standard Union Reduced From Two to One Cent

The Brooklyn (N. Y.) Standard Union on Monday of this week announced a reduction in price of from two cents to one cent daily, or seven days for seven cents. It is the first newspaper of greater New York to go to the penny price since the World War.

"The increase in circulation has justified the reduction," R. F. R. Huntsman, publisher, said to EDITOR & PUBLISHER on the third day of the new price. "The increase has been very considerable since the new price went into effect, far beyond our expectations.

"The Standard Union now selling for one cent is the same size as the former two-cent paper, and we are going to try to improve it."

Mr. Huntsman declined to make public the price at which the reduced paper was being sold to newsdealers and agents. The price cut was extensively advertised in all New York and Brooklyn newspapers during the week.

J. N. MACY BUYS SHARE IN TARRYTOWN NEWS

Publisher of Yonkers Statesman Now Vice-President of Wallace Odell's Daily—Latter to Spend Time in Travel

Wallace Odell this week announced that J. Noel Macy, publisher of the Yonkers (N. Y.) Statesman had purchased an interest in the Tarrytown (N. Y.) Daily News and would henceforth be identified with the paper as vice-president.

Mr. Macy is the son of V. Everett Macy, a well-known New York capitalist, who has devoted recent years of his life to such public causes as the state park system. The son became interested in the newspaper business at Yonkers. He worked for a time as a reporter on the Statesman, later purchasing the business.

The Tarrytown Daily News has been called the "largest small city newspaper in the United States." Tarrytown has a population of only 13,500 and the newspaper's circulation is 2,700, but an average of 16 pages are published daily and last year's linage totalled four millions. Mr. Odell established the paper as a weekly in 1897. It became an afternoon daily 15 years ago. Wallace Odell was formerly president of the National Editorial Association and has been active in newspaper organization work, both in the nation and New York state, for many years.

Mr. Odell said: "It is with a great deal of satisfaction that I am able to announce Mr. Macy as my associate on the News. He will relieve me of much of the work, giving me an opportunity to carry out some of my desires to travel. I remain as president of the newspaper company and, of course, the policy of the Daily News will continue as heretofore."

It is understood that the sale of the stock interest was made through Harwell & Cannon, brokers.

Montreal Gazette Editor Retires

Robert S. White, editor-in-chief of the Montreal Gazette, is retiring from active journalism. He will soon reach his 70th birthday. Announcement of Mr. White's forthcoming retirement was made at a recent dinner in Montreal. Paul Bilkey will direct the political policy of the Gazette.

Jarnagin Heads New Iowa Group

A new group, "United Newspapers of Iowa" was formed last week at a meeting in Cherokee, Ia., with W. C. Jarnagin of Storm Lake as chairman. The group will maintain an advertising office in Chicago for the purpose of soliciting national advertising.

Warren (Pa.) Tribune Reorganized

The Warren (Pa.) Tribune, formed two years ago, has been reorganized and funds have been provided assuring publication for at least three years, it is announced. E. D. Wetmore has been chosen president of the reorganized company, R. C. Chapel vice-president; F. C. Bogart, secretary, and Henry H. Bassett treasurer and managing director. W. T. Kelly has succeeded E. W. Stone as a director of the company.

WRONG DATE COSTLY

Three British Papers Pay £600 for Printing Incorrect Marriage Date

Three British newspapers were ordered to pay damages of £600 recently to a woman whose marriage date had been printed incorrectly.

A Mrs. Ethel L. Campbell filed suit for divorce against her husband in 1923. The couple were married June 8, 1907, and had three children, one born in 1909 and twins in 1915. The husband did not defend the divorce suit. Three newspapers, the Hornsey Journal, the London Gazette and the North Middlesex Chronicle, had printed a story from a local correspondent reciting some of the testimony before the Court. By mistake these stories stated that Mrs. Campbell was married June 18, 1917. The woman employed counsel to sue the newspapers for civil libel, alleging her reputation had been damaged among those who knew her, by the implication that she had lived with her husband 10 years before marrying him. As soon as the newspapers were notified by her counsel they printed a correction and an apology. The apology stated that the marriage took place on June 18, 1907, which, being ten days later than the actual date, did not satisfy the lady or her counsel.

A jury awarded the £600 verdict for Mrs. Campbell.

Holding "Ideal Home" Exhibition

Special cheap-fare rail excursions from all parts of England are run by the railway groups to the "Ideal Home Exhibition" run in London by the London Daily Mail during March. This exhibition which has been run every year for ten years, is organized entirely by the newspaper, and is one of the most successful exhibitions held in England. All the latest labor-saving devices for the home are on view, and several complete houses, beautifully furnished, are build inside the gigantic hall at the London Olympia, while masterpieces of the gardener's art, lawns, waterfalls, and so on, are laid out inside the building. The Mail advertises the Exhibition in large-space displays in all important newspapers.

ALMOST $750,000,000 IN 1925 NEWSPAPER ADS

Editor & Publisher's Annual Tabulation of Linage for More Than 1,000 Papers Indicates Total Far Surpassed Early Estimates—Leaders in Total, National, Local and Classified Listed

NEWSPAPER advertising volume in 1925 will exceed that of 1924 by at least eight per cent and probably by a greater margin, and the sum invested by advertisers in this—to many of them newly discovered—medium of sales production will approximate $700,000,000. It will not be surprising, in view of the figures for August which appear on another page, if the amount proves to be considerably greater.

Editor & Publisher for Sept. 19, '25.

REVISED estimates of the amount of money invested in newspaper advertising last year, based upon the complete returns of more than 1,000 daily and Sunday newspapers, place the figure at $736,000,000. This figure is based on statistics of approximately 34 per cent of the total linage of American newspapers in 1925, showing an increase of about 10 per cent over 1924 linage. As the increase in terms of dollars is calculated at $100,000,000, or about 15 per cent over the 1924 estimated figure, a third of the gain is apparently due to advertising rate advances.

The tables on subsequent pages of this issue present the linage of 208 morning papers, 595 evening papers and 236 Sunday issues in 539 cities in the United States, having a total population (at present estimates) of 39,427,000, or 34 per cent of the 115,000,000 now said to inhabit the United States. Also included are 14 morning, 32 evening and 4 Sunday newspapers of Canada, published in 28 cities.

Morning newspapers of the United States printed a total of 1,634,060,278 agate lines. Of this total, they reported the following sub-divisions: National, 276,412,933 lines; local, 962,181,168 lines; classified, 303,176,797 lines.

National, 493,209,218 lines; local, 2,064,153,157 lines; classified, 437,829,066 lines.

In both cases, there is a discrepancy of about 6 per cent—somewhat less in the case of the morning papers—between the sum of these divisions and the totals stated above. This arises from the failure of a number of newspapers to segregate their linage into the standard classifications. Sunday linage is included in the totals stated as "morning" or as "evening," because most newspapers report Sunday figures combined with the daily totals. Metropolitan papers generally follow the more correct and practical plan of reporting the daily and Sunday volume separately, but the simpler method has many adherents in the smaller cities.

Canadian morning papers showed a total volume for the year of 103,111,981 lines, divided thus:

National, 27,811,007 lines; local, 55,292,499 lines; classified, 15,306,454 lines.

National, 50,843,606 lines; local, 100,866,478 lines; classified, 26,044,182 lines.

Returning to the United States press, the following list, ranked according to the population of city of publication, gives the figures on all of the leaders in all cities and all classifications. Only a handful of important papers are not listed, an omission not due to neglect by the compiling staff of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, but to the failure of these newspapers to answer several mail and telegraphic inquiries for the information.

The opposition which publishers frequently presented to publication of linage data a few years ago is found rarely now. The few publishers who refuse the data or give it grudgingly as a rule have figures which compare unfavorably with those of competitors. The old assertion that it was information which could be used unfairly in labor scale proceedings by union representatives is no longer heard.

On the other hand, one encounters evidence that publishers and other newspaper executives are recognizing the national linage statistics presented by EDITOR & PUBLISHER as an important part of the body of knowledge that the industry began to collect about its operations about a dozen years ago. The chief value of linage statistics to newspapers of the rank and file is that they picture the composite experience of many newspapers, from which conclusions can be drawn and applied with modifications to the individual newspaper unit. The application processes are as yet imperfectly understood by newspapers and their economic specialists, but early steps to make this application valuable have been undertaken and some of them will be outlined in an early issue of this publication.

One result of this study of composite figures by statisticians has been the discovery that during the past two years advertisers have delayed their summer curtailment of advertising to July and that they have resumed heavier schedules in August, also that the former dip in the first two months of the year is not nearly so pronounced as it was during the first years of collected statistics. The July "valley" in the charted curve was considerably deeper in 1924 and 1925 than in previous years. Newspaper publishers and advertising managers who met this condition in their own operations no doubt ascribed it to local causes, which, also without doubt, had their share in bringing it about. However, when the slump for the month is so general as to be reflected in a curve of the linage of more than 100 newspapers covering every large city in the country, the justifiable inference is that the causes are not purely local.

Again, with twelve years of partial statistics and perhaps five years of really representative figures, the records of newspapers in fields of every size and character, the statisticians are beginning to look for "cycles" of newspaper advertising similar to those which, some authorities maintain, characterize the movement of the stock markets.

One engineer believes that newspaper advertising runs in a seven year cycle and that at this writing the industry is entering upon—only entering upon, mind you—another great upward swing.—It is his theory that the newspapers have not published all the business that the charted curve called for and that until the final quarter of last year their monthly totals fell below the normal curve for the month. It is seven years since the 1919 post-armistice peak of advertising, and his seven year theory will either fall or gain strength by the events of the next ten months.

Another theory which has come back in the past few months is one entertained years ago by some of the rule-of-thumb empiricists of the newspaper business who quite often discovered the fundamentals without modern mathematics to aid them. It is that a given number of people making up a city's population should produce so many dollars and cents per annum for the newspapers published in their midst. Linage statistics for individual cities and for groups of cities are being used to ascertain whether this theory has any demonstrable basis.

All these are theories, one might say, airy things that the advertising solicitor and hustling publisher can't bother with—being too busy making a living for themselves and the theorists. They are theories. They may be true. They may be chimeras. If the latter, they can quickly be forgotten. If true, they can be of inestimable value to the business. If advertising does run more or less true to a cycle and that cycle can be platted on a chart, the publisher has a guide of immense value to his conduct for months ahead. The newspaper publishers, like the old Gloucester fishermen, as a rule carries sail up to the point of disaster. Retrenchment is not a regular newspaper policy even in times of trouble and when necessity forces it, the step is often taken too late or made too drastically for safety. The newspaper publisher is a born optimist, or less an enthusiastic convert to optimism, and pays little heed to warnings which mean storms to other business men. They don't apply to the newspaper business, he will tell you—newspapers keep going when all else stops, because newspaper advertising is even more essential in depressions than in booms. But, it is likely that he will heed conclusions drawn from his own operations and from those of his fellow publishers. With a boom indicated on the chart of his own affairs and confirmed by the charted experience of hundreds of others, the publisher could dispose his editorial budget to give the additional service that strengthens the paper with readers. He might place advantageous contracts for extra paper and other supplies and equipment. He might prepare a new rate card to take advantage of the increased demand for his advertising space. He might organize his advertising staff in advance to make the most of the impending prosperity. He might do all of these things in reverse, and a good many others, if the industry's map indicated that the time for depression was nigh. The idea, of course, is that he can do what should be done before the acute necessity for doing it swamps him. The newspaper mortality of the past seven years indicates that acute necessity has been fatal for many newspaper institutions.

The utility of linage statistics to the space-buyer is so apparent that it needs no demonstration. In fact, so apparent is it that linage figures have suffered from over-use by newspapers which use them as their principal selling argument. The ancient epigram that figures don't lie, but liars figure finds many supporters among space-buyers and among newspaper men themselves, outraged by the ingenious twisting of linage statistics. The newspaper men are especially stirred to wrath when competitor artfully aligns classifications and figures under an all-inclusive head to prove a supremacy that is not his. This is an evil which is not so common now as in the past—probably due to the regular and careful publication of linage compilations. The assertions of the enthusiastic promotion man in paid space or direct-by-mail literature lose authority when they do not check, at least approximately, with the statistics published with no intent to sell any particular newspaper or newspapers.

Even the latter are not nearly so accurate or informative as they should be and will be when their more valuable uses are understood by newspaper men. Standards are gradually being evolved to eliminate unfair comparisons between competitors and to present true indications of the advertising patronage enjoyed by each of the newspapers in a field. For instance, very few organizations publishing morning, evening and Sunday newspapers from one plant now insist that only one total shall be stated for their linage, counting the business twice although it was sold only once. Less than half a dozen such totals appear in the current tabulation.

The morning-and-evening publishers as a rule submit totals for their morning and Sunday and for their evening issues separately; a few of them whose Sunday paper is a part of the evening establishment submit figures accordingly.

A new tendency which is as yet reflected only slightly in these tables appears in fields where a morning-evening-Sunday combination has as its principal competitor a strong evening and Sunday paper. Several of these combination publishers now group their Sunday paper with the evening issue, even though the Sunday paper bears the name and serial number of their morning paper. The ethics and the utility of this practice are equally doubtful.

A. L. Glasmann, co-publisher of the Ogden (Utah) Standard-Examiner was named president of the newly organized Utah-Idaho Members of the Associated Press at a meeting in Salt Lake City March 3. William Wallin of Pocatello was named vice-president and R. G. Smith, Salt Lake correspondent of the A. P., secretary. Mr. Glasmann was also named representative for the district on the A. P. Advisory Board. Kent Cooper, A. P. general manager, attended the organization meeting.

INVENTOR OF HALF-TONE PROCESS HONORED

Frederick E. Ives Presented With Gold Medal by United Typothetae in Recognition of His Many Inventions

Ernst F. Eilert, New York, president of the United Typothetæ of America on March 4, presented Frederick E. Ives with a gold medal in honor of his achievements in engraving processes, color photography and allied arts. The presentation was made in Philadelphia at the fourth annual graphic arts night in the Penn Athletic Club.

Preceding the awarding of the medal William T. Innes enumerated the many inventions credited to Mr. Ives, the three-color plate process, the half-tone plate now in use and which displaced the laborious and expensive wood cuts of 40 years ago; the intaglio process, the forerunner of the rotogravure process, the modern form of the binocular microscope, plastograms, by which motion pictures are made to assume roundness of form and the somewhat allied inventions—the chromescope, for reproducing the colors of nature by photographic process, and the parralex stereogram for giving relief to transparent photographic plates.

"His inventions," Mr. Innes said, "will rank among the greatest of all history."

Ives, a printer's apprentice as a boy in Litchfield, Conn., at the age of 21 was employed by Cornell University to establish a department devoted to photographic work and research. There he conceived the idea that later was developed into the half-tone printing plate now used generally all over the world.

In 1881 Ives went to Philadelphia to make half-tone plates commercially. The Government was his first customer and therefore the first purchaser of half-tone plates anywhere in the world.

AWARDED PRESS SCHOLARSHIP

L. Lee Starke Wins N. J. Press Association Award in Journalism

In the presence of Gov. A. Harry Moore, members of the New Jersey legislature and newspapermen in Trenton re-cently, L. Lee Starke, Rutgers student was awarded the New Jersey Press Association Scholarship in Journalism for 1926. The presentation was made by J. E. Lent, publisher of the Passaic Daily News, who as president of the Association last year was responsible for the founding of the course in journalism at Rutgers. Starke was selected by Prof. Allen Sinclair Will and members of the faculty as the most promising and deserving member of this year's class in journalism. He is a candidate for the degree of Bachelor of Letters at the commencement next June.

Starke is editor of the Targum, the undergraduate newspaper of Rutgers, and a member of the Student Council, the undergraduate governing body of the university. He is also president of the Inter-collegiate Newspaper Association of the Middle Atlantic States.

Starke is the correspondent at Rutgers of the New York Times, the Brooklyn Daily Eagle and the Newark Evening News. His home is at Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

U. S. REPORTERS CHAT WITH LONDON VIA RADIO

Epochal Event Signalizing Achievement of Two-Way Transatlantic Wireless Telephony Attended by 22 News Writers in New York, March 7—Woman First to Speak to British Newspaper Group

By MABEL ABBOTT

MARCH 7, 1926, will go down in history as the date on which for the first time two-way transatlantic conversations by radio telephony were held by other persons than the telephone and wireless experts who have been experimenting with two-way transmission. But in the memories of the twenty-two American news writers who conducted the New York ends of the conversations, the date will be marked particularly as that on which they suddenly and bewilderedly found themselves exchanging shop-talk and jokes with twenty-three British news writers in London, as if their papers were in the same town, instead of being separated by 3,500 miles of ocean and more than that distance of tradition, custom and viewpoint.

MABEL ABBOTT

I know, because I was one of them.

The test, as the whole world now knows, was part of a continuing series of experiments being carried on by the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, the Radio Corporation of America, and the British General Post Office. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company, it is also pretty generally known, does the research work for the entire Bell system.

One-way radio telephone transmission had been achieved in 1915 by engineers of the Bell system, using the large antennae of the U. S. Navy Department at Arlington, Va. In that year they transmitted speech to listeners in the Eiffel Tower in Paris, and to the Hawaiian Islands. On Jan. 14, 1923, telephone officials talked continuously for two hours by wire and radio from New York City to a group of scientists and engineers in London; but this too was a one-way test.

In the test last week, the voices from America were carried from New York 70 miles over telephone wires to the radio transmitting station of the Radio Corporation at Rocky Point, Long Island; thence by radio 3,300 miles to a receiving station of the British General Post Office at Wroughton, England; and thence over telephone circuits 70 miles to London. The voices from England came over an entirely different path—70 miles by telephone wire to a radio sending station at Rugby, England, thence by radio 2,900 miles to a radio receiving station at Houlton, Me., and thence over telephone circuits 600 miles to New York City.

Practical difficulties make it impossible as yet, according to officials, to say when regular commercial transatlantic radio telephone service will be available. In last Sunday's test, however, it seemed to the reporters as if all difficulties had been overcome,—except the one tremendous difficulty of finding anything to say. Somehow, in our interest over the significance of the achievement which we were to be privileged to test, most of us had failed to grasp that we ourselves were to be thrust into the limelight as performers, and find ourselves reported as well as reporters.

Frankly, we floundered. We wanted to say something appropriate to the importance of the occasion, and we couldn't think of a thing but the weather, and the time of day, and, when the pressure grew desperate, Prohibition.

I had the honor—much appreciated but very embarrassing—of being the first speaker. I can claim to be the first person, other than the arranging experts, to talk across the Atlantic Ocean by two-way wireless telephony, and the first woman who ever did so.

We sat in a large room in the telephone company's big building at No. 24 Walker street. Chairs around the sides of the room, and tables in the center, were equipped with receivers to clamp on our ears. At the end of the room were two booths, one for the expert in charge of the conversation, and one for the eager but perspiring speaker of the moment, who spoke into an instrument which looked just like an ordinary telephone except for a queer transmitter.

J. Pollard of the London Daily Chronicle later described the room in the British General Post Office where they sat. "It is long and lofty and lit by electric light," he said. "In one corner there are a number of telephone engineers and a good deal of apparatuses. There are two rows of chairs and tables at which newspaper men and officials are taking notes." The British General Post Office is only a stones throw from St. Paul's.

I spoke first with Mr. D. R. Spendlove, of the London Press Association. He said "Good afternoon" and I said "Good morning." Both of us were right. It was nearly two in the afternoon for him, and not yet nine in the morning for me. I asked him what time it was, and he told me. I asked what kind of weather they were having in London, and he told me that. I asked if he heard me clearly, and he said "Very well indeed." I asked him what papers he represented, —which I already knew,—and he told me that. I asked if English reporters would send any message to American ones, and he said "Yes, very complimentary messages."

There was a pause. Then he asked me what time it was and I told him; what kind of weather it was, and I told him. He asked me something else, but I have forgotten what it was. Then our two minutes were up.

One after another the reporters stepped into the booth and did their best. It was hard going for a while. Later, it eased up as the Englishmen began to poke fun at the Americans for being late, and both sides began to realize that they were talking with fellow-craftsmen who were squirming just as uncomfortably as themselves in their novel position.

From my notes I collect the following scraps of epochmaking interchange of ideas. H. Harper of the London Daily Mail, called my attention to the fact that this was the 50th anniversary of the issuance of the Bell patents. He wondered how soon we would have regular transatlantic telephone service. I wondered whether, when we did, it would effect any revolution in the work of reporters. He wondered too. He said probably the next step would be transatlantic airship service, and said England had heard that the big new airship we were building would be used for that purpose. He said the weather was dull and cloudy in London. I asked if the London climate hadn't been slandered a little, and he said they were used to almost anything in the way of weather. Two minutes up.

E. J. Palmer of the London Daily News asked what effect I thought transatlantic wireless telephony would have on the relations between America and England. Didn't I think that people who knew each other best, like husband and wife, often quarreled most?

C. Fraser of the London Daily Telegraph asked one of the telephone officials if American reporters all went to church Sunday morning. F. V. Wright of the Yorkshire Post asked Alva Johnson of the New York Times if the Americans were late because they had been trying to read one of their Sunday papers.

By this time we were all enjoying ourselves. J. Pollard of the London Daily Chronicle discussed the French crisis with J. M. Abbott of the Brooklyn Eagle. This was one of the few subjects of serious current news referred to, and it was mentioned by several speakers. Several of the Englishmen asked concerning our recent Wall Street excitement. Mr. Pollard remarked that now that we could talk by wireless we probably soon would be able to see by wireless too.

Barrow Lyons, Associated Press, also predicted television, in his talk with P. D. Holt of the London Central News. Mr. Lyons transmitted a short news dispatch to J. G. Green, representing Reuter's.

J. A. Morris of the Wall Street Journal swapped jokes about the financial situation with William Underhill of the London Financial News. "How about rubber?" inquired Mr. Underhill. "We haven't heard much from Mr. Hoover lately."

It was at about this stage of the test that somebody in London opened a window, and to the ears of the reporters in New York came, soft and clear, the chiming of the bells of St. Paul's Cathedral.

"How do you feel about Countess Cathcart?" asked J. Walsh of the New York Graphic of J. Spence of the Glasgow Herald. "I am a young man of tender years," hedged Mr. Spence. "I think we had better go on to another subject."

Mr. Spence sent the greetings of his Scout troop to the Boy Scouts of America. He also professed much interest in the habits of the American species of reporter.

"Do you all gallop about in Fords?" he wanted to know.

H. F. Foulkes of the Glasgow Record told James Montague of the New York Herald Tribune he wanted to ask a serious question. "Are the women's skirts in America as short as you can see by the illustrations that they are in England?"

"Oh, shorter!" replied Mr. Montague.

"I'm coming over at once," declared Mr. Foulkes.

Miss Ethel Halsey of the Associated Press, after discovering that she was talking with M. N. Austin of The Engineer, exclaimed in surprise: "Oh, I thought I was to have a style expert, and you are only an engineer!"

I have not quoted any of the questions and comments about Prohibition, because they were as numerous as those about the weather. Whenever one of those awful pauses occurred, one side or the other asked how the weather was, or

JUDGE WHITE SILENT AS DAILIES PRINT TRIAL TESTIMONY HE BARRED

Full Reports of Bay St. Louis Murder Case Reaching Hancock County Despite Judicial Edict—U.P. and A.P. String Wires to Court House

NO CONTEMPT CHARGES YET

Bay St. Louis, Miss., March 11.—Newspaper men who had violated a court order instructing newspapers circulating in Hancock County to refrain from publishing testimony developed in the Favre trial have returned to their homes without contempt proceedings being instituted against them, as had been considered probable.

(By Telegraph to Editor & Publisher)

BAY ST. LOUIS, Miss., March 10.—The newspapers have violated Judge Walter A. White's edict barring publication of testimony at the murder trial of Jesse Favre "from papers having a circulation in Hancock county" and the judge has not yet decided what action he will take.

The trial opened Thursday, March 4, but testimony was not presented until Saturday. On Sunday several out-of-town newspapers carrying accounts of the trial appeared in this city, and full accounts of each day's testimony have been available since. The newspapers most widely circulated here are those published in New Orleans, 52 miles away.

Judge White told Editor & Publisher he did not quite know what he was going to do about the violations of his order. He indicated he would take no action until the present case is settled.

The Judge's order isued Feb. 27, barring printing of testimony from papers circulating in Hancock county has made the trial of such widespread interest that Associated Press and United Press leased wires have been installed in court house in this quaint Mississippi coast city for the first time in history.

The New Orleans Item attempted to obtain an injunction restraining Judge White from putting his order into effect from Chancellor V. A. Griffith of this district, but this was denied. The Chancellor stated that Judge White was of equal dignity and he did not feel free to interfere with his court.

At the opening of the trial Judge White summoned reporters into the court room and again made clear his initial statement to prevent publication of testimony.

The Judge said that he had given his ruling very careful consideration before making it, and that he had made the order for the purpose of requiring obedience to it. He based his authority on the inherent power of the court to prevent interference or obstruction of trials.

Reporters present at the trial are: Gordon Huff, New Orleans Times-Picayune; W. D. Robinson, New Orleans States; Frank Craigie, Gulfport-Biloxi Daily Herald, New Orleans Item and Memphis Commercial Appeal; Don Higgins, United Press and New Orleans Morning Tribune; Brian Bell, Associated Press, and Jack Bethea of Birmingham, of the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

The Judge inquired of each reporter how his story could be recognized. Answers in most cases were: "By bylines." The Judge delayed the opening of court by directing the court stenographer to copy his press ruling and give each reporter a copy.

For the first time in the annals of South Mississippi counties press wires were strung in a court house. The tax collector's office has a United Press wire and the county engineer's office an Associated Press wire. From these two wires news of the trial is distributed to the papers of the country.

The Judge treats correspondents cordially and they all like him.

Frank Craigie, veteran reporter of the Gulfport-Biloxi Herald, said: "The newspaper correspondents here fully understand Judge White's problem and we would be happy to find some solution of the difficulty which would not abridge what tradition has taught us was and is the inalienable freedom of the press, the nation's guarantee of which was written into the Constitution. We have been reading law for the past week, and we are resting on the same Constitution that the Judge is."

Favre, the defendant in the trial, is being tried on a charge of murder resulting from the deaths of J. A. McClemore and W. M. Mingee, Federal entomologists, slain on Feb. 18, near Picayune, Miss., while on a hunting expedition. The defendant is charged in this case with the murder of McClemore.

N. Y. TIMES NOW USING DRY MATS ONLY

Steam Tables Removed This Week and Direct Pressure Machines Installed After Test Begun in November Last Year

The New York Times this week determined to adopt the exclusive use of dry matrices in its stereotype department, after a test which was begun in November of last year. Steam tables were being removed on Wednesday and Thursday. One Birotadruck direct pressure machine has been installed and more have been ordered. "Certified" dry mats are being used.

The Times' experiment has been watched with considerable interest by newspapers in this country. At present in the large number of cases wet mats are the rule, despite the fact the Northcliffe press in England went on a dry mat basis exclusively as early as 1910.

Other Metropolitan newspapers which are now using dry mats exclusively include the Philadelphia Bulletin and the Philadelphia Inquirer.

After the three months' test, the Times reached the conclusion that more uniform printing results from a plate cast from a good dry mat than from a wet mat. Speed, facility of handling and comfort are mentioned as reasons for organizing on a dry mat basis.

The dry mat was first developed extensively in Germany 25 years ago. In that country it was early put to use by newspapers, which, however, were of small page size. It was long thought the dry mat would not be strong enough for a United States standard newspaper page although it was proving very practical for tabloids. When a mat was finally developed that could stand up for fifty or sixty casts, the Northcliffe press commenced to adopt it, and in 1910 the last steam table was removed from these papers.

JAILED FOR BRIBE ATTEMPT

Shamokin, Pa., Man Offered Ledger Employe $100 To Change Stock Total

Harry Yoder of Shamokin, Pa., was given a 60-day term in federal court at Scranton, Pa., this week because he tried to bribe a newspaper editor. Yoder, according to postal officials, in October of last year sent a letter to a member of the Philadelphia Public Ledger staff offering him $100 or $150 if he would see to it that the Ledger misquoted the total stock sales figures for Oct. 25.

The letter was turned over to postal authorities. It was then discovered that Yoder had purchased a lottery ticket and that if the Ledger had used the figures he sugested he would have won $500. When the prisoner was arraigned he entered a plea of guilty and was sentenced to 60 days in jail at Sunbury.

American-Mexican Wire Rates Cut

Senor Ortiz, Mexican Minister of Communications, and F. W. Phelan, American Telephone and Telegraph Company and Western Union on March 9, signed a contract in Mexico City for the reduction of cable and telegraph rates to the United States. The press will have a direct wire to New York City at half the present rates, according to a special dispatch to the New York Times.

MILLION LINE FEBRUARY GAIN IN N. Y.

NEW YORK CITY newspapers showed an advertising linage gain of more than 1,000,000 lines in February as compared with the same month a year ago. Total Volume for the month was 13,047,666 lines as against 11,858,168 for 1925.

STATE CERTIFICATES FOR NEWSPAPER MEN ADVOCATED BY ILLINOIS PRESS

Endorse Plan By Resolution at Chicago Meeting—Group's Committee on Education to Draw Up Qualifications and Standards—Aiming at "Professional Status"

A DEFINITE step to put the journalist on a professional par with medical and legal men was taken at the mid-winter meeting of the Illinois State Press Association at the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, March 5 and 6.

A resolution was adopted "that the Illinois Press Association endorse the issuance of professional certificates to practicing newspapermen under conditions to be determined by the committee on education of the Illinois Press Association."

Lawrence W. Murphy, of the school of journalism of the University of Illinois, chairman of the committee on education of the Illinois group, introduced the resolutions in the course of a paper on the subject.

While it has not yet been definitely determined on what basis the certificate will be issued and whether it is planned to have the state recognize such certificate, Mr. Murphy said:

"In general the committee plans to recognize five years' experience as a professional education for the present membership and a combination of experience and schooling as the basis for recognizing the young men and women now seeking professional standing.

"This plan would make the Illinois Press Association the certificate and credential issuing body for the members of the profession in Illinois. The certificates would have the same value to journalism and the public that a medical certificate has to a doctor and his patients."

Edward A. Cogley of the Maywood (Ill.) Herald moved that the committee on education include a representative of a weekly, a daily and a member of the faculty of the school of journalism of the state university, provided two members do not come from the same county. This was adopted. Definite action is expected at the annual meeting of the association next autumn.

"The purpose of the licensing plan is to preserve all the good features of the licensing system without sacrificing freedom of the press or placing the press in the hands of politicians," Mr. Murphy, originator of the idea told EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "The committee will at all times be accountable to the Illinois Press Association under the present arrangement. The plan has no direct connection with membership in the Association and membership is not to be considered in the application of the plan. The measure does not restrict freedom of the press as persons can be active in journalism without seeking the professional certificate.

"Through the plan the Association hopes to lend stability and dignity to the profession, to eliminate the beginners who are not serious in their intention of entering the profession, and to reduce the turnover in editorial staff workers which is the cause of trouble, expense and errors."

Members of the Committee on Education are W. F. Hardy, Decatur Herald; T. B. Potter, Marshall Herald; Mr. Murphy, University of Illinois.

President William J. Smith, of the Waukegan Sun, opened the meeting. Mayor William E. Dever gave an address of welcome in which he made an attack on the Better Government Association of Chicago for asking a senate inquiry into Chicago's administration, the uniform body having charged collusion between Chicago officials and the criminal and bootlegging element.

Joseph Page, of Jerseyville, responded to Mayor Dever's address. H. L. Williamson, editor of the United States Publisher, Springfield, secretary of the association, read his report. Harvey T. Hill, secretary of the Illinois Chamber of Commerce, spoke on "The Chamber of Commerce and Its Relation to the Newspapers." Eugene L'Hote, Milford, talked on "Building Up Community Interest Through the Newspaper." John H. Volp, Blue Island, took for his subject "Should the United States Government Continue to Print Return Envelopes and Thereby Remain a Competitor of the Job Printer?"

At the banquet Friday evening, Frederick Snyder of the special commissioner for the Press Congress of the World, spoke on the plans of the Congress for the meeting in Geneva, Switzerland, Sept. 14-18. He gave a short outline of the itinerary that will be followed and gave a brief report on the expenses of the trip. Several members of the Illinois Press Association group have already signified their intention of going he declared. State's attorney Robert Crowe, of Cook County, spoke on "Crime and the Newspaper's Part in Helping Handle It."

At the Saturday session, Frank P. Glass, former managing director, St. Louis Star, and member of the executive committee, Press Congress of the World, spoke on "Newspapers As I Saw Them In Foreign Lands." Aaron N. Sick, general manager of Building Publications, Waukegan, on "The Publication of Magazines."

H. J. Kable of Mount Morris led a discussion on adding to income by soliciting the printing of house organs. A. T. Spivey, of the East St. Louis Journal, spoke on "How May the Editor of a Country Weekly or a Small Daily Find Subjects for Original Editorials." H. U. Bailey of the Princeton Republican, on "The International Press Foundation —What It Is."

Congressman William E. Hull of Peoria addressed the meeting on "The Deep Waterway." W. H. Gharrity, Savannah Times Journal on "Building A Circulation;" Frank Lee of the Aurora Beacon-News on "How To Build Up Your Classified Page." C. R. Denson of the Minonk News-Dispatch, led a discussion on "Building Circulation."

The association accepted the invitation of EDITOR & PUBLISHER to use its Chicago office, 30 North Dearborn street, for a Chicago headquarters.

The following committees were appointed:

Resolutions: Hal W. Trovillion, Herrin News; John H. Volp, Blue Island Sun-Standard; S. P. Preston, Gillespie News.

CHICAGO NEWS CHANGES STYLE

Column Widths Cut from 13½ to 12½ Ems—Two Page 1 Banners

The Chicago Daily News has changed its makeup, cutting its column widths from 13½ ems to 12½ ems and cutting off six ems of white space at the edge of the paper. The editorial page, formerly eight columns, 13½ ems to the column, is now made up in seven columns, the two editorial columns and Keith Preston's "Hit or Miss" column, getting the extra space.

This is the most important of a number of changes since Walter Strong took control. Under Victor F. Lawson's regime two banners were forbidden. Now almost daily in the News, there is an eight column line and a seven column line, with the lines breaking into the story, another change.

The news columns on the front page are double leaded and on the inside pages are also leaded.

FOREST WEEK APRIL 18-24

Dates Set by President Coolidge in Official Proclamation

The week of April 18-24 was designated American Forest Week in a proclamation issued by President Coolidge and made public March 6.

The Canadian Government has set apart the same week for the same purpose, and this, President Coolidge declared in his proclamation, "is an added reason why our citizens should give careful thought to a matter so important to both countries."

Although warning that "too long have we, as a nation, consumed our forest wealth without adequate provision for its wise utilization and renewal," the President noted that a "gratifying change is taking place in the attitude of our industries, our land owners and the American people toward our forests."

N. Y. NEWSPAPERS PROBE STRIKE CLUBBINGS

Investigations Under Way by News, Mirror, World and Graphic, Pending Possible Legal Action—Police Cleared by One Inquiry

Investigations were being made this week by the New York Daily News, the New York Mirror, New York World, and New York Evening Graphic, pending possible legal action to be taken as the result of the Clifton, N. J., strike riot March 3, during which staff reporters and photographers were clubbed by police and valuable cameras smashed.

The News is proceeding independently of the other papers, with the case in the hands of MacDonald Dewitt, New York attorney. It is understood the three other dailies may later join forces in appointing one attorney to represent them in possible court proceedings. In this event, Keats Speed, managing editor of the New York Sun, informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER, his newspaper might also become a complainant in the case.

Mr. Dewitt said he was still conducting investigations in Clifton and Passaic, when questioned Thursday.

"It seems, so far as I have gone now, that the smashing of cameras was done by the Clifton police and not by the Passaic police," he said.

The scene of the hostilities according to statements made by reporters of the Mirror, was near Dayton and Highland Avenues, the latter being the dividing between the towns of Clifton and Passaic. Clifton police were keeping order on one side of the street and Passaic police on the other.

Col. Vickers, former Hudson County, N. J. district attorney, has been retained by Mr. Dewitt as associate in the News case.

Harry Warnecke, News photographer, was badly beaten by police and his camera demolished.

Isaac D. White, head of the Bureau of Accuracy and Fair Play of the New York World, has obtained statements from Evening and Morning World men in the melée, and is conducting further inquiry in the strike territory.

Joseph Costa, Jr., World photographer, declares in his affidavit that he saw the attack on Warnecke of the News, and, reaching the conclusion "to resist was the height of folly," gave up his camera and saw it smashed to bits.

William Warnecke, elder brother of the News' photographer, states he saw his brother's camera smashed, and his brother surrounded by police. He was unable, he said, to obtain the names of the policemen.

Reporters submitting statements to Mr. White were Godfrey Irwin and B. D. Gallager, Evening World, and C. B. Allen, Morning World. They assert they were in the jam, saw the clubbing and camera breaking, but stated they were unable to identify anybody.

The office of William DeFord, Hearst attorney, has received statements from six reporters and photographers of the Daily Mirror.

O. J. Bauman, Mirror photographer, asserts he can identify the policeman who, he said, picked him out, ran directly into him holding his club in both hands, knocked him down and smashed his camera.

Thomas Flanagan of the Mirror told attorneys he was struck across the back with a policeman's club and painfully injured. His camera was knocked from his hands and wrecked.

Occupants of the Mirror armored car which was wrecked in collision with a large truck said they had no proof the smash was a result of the hostility toward the photographers.

During the week there have been no further disturbances in the strike district. Police have been friendly to newspaper men and have not attacked strikers.

The Botany Worsted Mills, largest affected by the strike, started an advertising campaign in local newspapers, explaining their position.

Chapter XXXIII
Schemes I Have Worked

In just the same way had I, and other boys, boosted the sale of Arbuckle coffee, years before, when we were collecting those old travel cards.

The sugar cookie box lid collecting race started the ball rolling, and was a good introduction for the second scheme, which was known as "The Sugar Cookie Boy Coloring Contest."

A young artist who was pioneering around with me, trying to get a toe-hold start in the advertising art business, Russ Legge, who has his own business in Detroit now, helped out on the scheme.

He made six sketches, each a different pose, of a little Dutch baker boy, dressed in big pantaloons, a full waist with large collar and cuffs and flowing tie.

Each picture was merely an outline, and each baker lad held a large sugar cookie in his hand.

Certain letters were drawn on each cookie, so that when the six cards of the Dutch boys were placed together the letters would spell out the words:

"Busy Bee Sugar Cookie."

Beginning with No. 1 the cards were placed in the boxes of cookies, one kind each week for six weeks.

The coloring contest began with a half-page newspaper advertisement, in which the six Sugar Cookie Boys appeared at the top in their proper positions, numbered from one to six. On each side boxes of sugar cookies were shown, and the names of the grocers appeared as in former advertisements.

In bold black-face type were the words, "Prize Coloring Contest for Children." Then followed a brief outline of the contest and the list of prizes. Every boy and girl who desired to enter the contest was asked to buy a box of sugar cookies and read the full detaills of the contest, as given on the back of a card which would be found in every box of Busy Bee Sugar Cookies. On one side of the card was printed a picture of one of the six Sugar Cookie Boys, and on the other side were the rules and conditions of the coloring contest, which were as follows:

SUGAR COOKIE BOY COLORING CONTEST.

Beginning April 23, for six weeks, every box of Busy Bee Sugar Cookies will contain one of the six Sugar Cookie Boys. A new card will appear each week. When you have the complete set paste them according to the numbers on a piece of heavy paper or cardboard, not over 8 inches wide by 24 inches long.

Color the boys, cookies and letters with water colors or crayons, as you like, and bring the full set to our office, 44 North Front Street, on Saturday, June 2, any time between 9 o'clock in the morning and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. No pictures will be received before that time.

You can submit as many sets as you like, but each set must be complete, and each must have your name, age and street number written on it plainly. Where there are several children in the family all may compete.

The successful pictures will be exhibited in our store window and the names of the winners and those receiving honorable mention will be printed in our newspaper advertisements.

The following prizes will be given for the best work in each of the three classes: Class A, for children under 7 years of age; Class B, for children between 7 and 10 years; Class C, for children between 10 and 14 years.

First Prize in each Class, $5 in Gold.

Second Prize in each Class, $2.50 in Gold.

Third Prize in each Class, $1 in Silver.

Fourth Prize in each Class, 75c box of bonbons.

Fifth to tenth Prizes in each Class, Honorable Mention.

A committee of three artists will judge the work and award the prizes. The coloring effect, neatness of arrangement, and the cleanliness of the work will determine the winners.

Suggestions.

You can begin coloring the pictures as you receive them, or wait until you have the entire set. It may be well to color several sets. each different, and enter them all in the contest. If you need a certain picture and cannot get it at your grocer's, you may exchange one of the other pictures for the one you need at our store, 43 North High Street.

No pictures will be returned.

At the beginning of each week a large advertisement was inserted in the newspapers, in which appeared a picture of the Sugar Cookie Boy that was to be placed in every box of sugar cookies that week.

On the rest of the days during the week, plain, straight sugar cookie arguments were featured in all the advertisements. Attention was constantly called to the contest in a note at the foot of the advertisement.

Beginning with the first week there was a decided increase in the number of boxes sold, which indicated the children were getting busy with paints and crayons.

The returns were much larger than expected and the originality and real artistic ability of the contestants of the various classes into which they were divided was a surprise to the judges.

After the prizes had been awarded and the names of the winners published in the newspapers, an invitation was sent to every child who had submitted a picture, to be present at a reception which was arranged to be held in the banquet room of the Busy Bee Company. Ice cream, cake and fruits were served to all contest participants and their mothers, or whoever accompanied the little ones.

The details of this old time stunt are given to show how thoroughly we went into prize contests in the early days.

Since the Sugar Cookie Coloring Contest I have and carried out many unique schemes, but nothing has ever equalled the interest arousing merits, and actual sales making qualities, of this colorful Dutch Boy Contest.

Chapter XXXIV
The Old Booming-Voiced Auctioneer

THE first night school I ever attended was one in picturesque profanity. It was free and exciting. It was held on the side-walk in front of a store where a free auction was taking place. A gang of small-town mischievous boys was having a lot of fun creating a disturbance, and deviling an old booming-voiced auctioneer, just to get chased and cussed. His fluency in cussing was equalled only by his fluency in auctioning off goods.

It was great fun getting the old fellow sore and being told where to go, and then not going. The boys kept raising a racket, bellowing in at the door, and shouting smart-cracks just because the old orator got so mad and cussed so beautifully. Anyway it was just small-town stuff, kidding an old toper everyone liked.

It was a liberal education in profanity. Perhaps too liberal and penetrating. This auctioneer knew more vicious sounding words and cuss phrases than I have ever heard since—even in the railroad yards and in print shops.

His name was Levi. He had been a pack peddler, and he had a roaring voice. In this village I don't remember such a thing as a policeman, and the constable never bothered the boys with their pranks. Levi had to protect himself with his voice and his cussing. After a time he made peace with the boys, by permitting them to come in and attend the auction, if they would keep quiet. This restored order, and the night school was transferred from the sidewalk to another night school inside the store where we were treated to the fastest and finest flow of oratory possible to be had in those days. Spongy-brained town boys learned a lot from the old auction shows.

The auctioneer was an old-time trail-blazer in word-of-mouth, gibble-gabble advertising, who will live long in the memories of those who were fortunate enough to live in country villages where auctions were great events. Some folks even came down town in their Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes.

He was the voice of the village. His loud-speaking, wise-cracking, word-booming, hand-clapping held this audience of villagers spell-bound. He gave mouth to high-sounding, high-handled selling phrases.

Out in front of the defunct clothing and general store, or the racket store where he was enthroned, was the display advertising in the form of a red flag on which was painted "Auction Today." There were not as many hocus-pocus tricks about auction as there was about an Indian Medicine Show.

I have made as much as 25 cents a day passing glaring hand-bills from door to door announcing, in the wildest kind of language, this spectacular event. There was plenty of hokum put on in big type in the hand-bills. But the red flag waving in front of the store, and the flaming red type of the hand-bills was not enough to startle the crowds.

When the auction started another bellowing-voiced man (usually a local loafer) was hired to walk up and down on the sidewalk in front of the store, ringing a dinner bell and shouting, "Auction—Auction—Auction" and so on ad infinitum.

An auction was supposed to dominate every other thing on Main Street. It did and more. The idea back of all this loud advertising was to get people excited and fill the store to overflowing—the more people the higher would go the spirited bidding.

Today the bell-ringing and yelling is not considered genteel advertising. But the red flag is still doing duty at the same old stand. Last winter in Atlantic City I counted a dozen red flags along the famous Board Walk calling attention to the auctions going on within.

But in the old days the glaring hand-bills, the bell-ringing and shouting were only in keeping with the methods and gift of gab of the old auctioneer performing on the inside.

In most small towns he was a well known local character, usually a Jack out of office. In every political campaign he was "out stumping for the grand old party"—at a price.

Then, even as today, the human voice was the most powerful means of swaying the public. Words flowed from the auctioneer like greased lightning.

As a type the old auctioneer was a heavy, shaggy appearing individual with a bright, smiling eye and a loud, carrying voice. It was a voice that carrie conviction. It never broke or becam husky. He must have originated that o phrase "to shoot off one's mouth."

He knew the power of the voice convince and persuade. Not a line ha he ever read of voice training. He ha never taken lessons in voice culture. H had a natural gift-of-gab and he lived talk, and had to talk to live. He talke loudly and boastingly about the goods had to sell.

Can't you hear him now?—"Well, folk step right up, crowd in a little close See this marvelous piece of merchandis Direct from Paris. New Yorkers wou fight to get it, but it costs too much ship it back to the wholesale house. W would rather sell it right here, friends.

"Now, folks, what am I bid? Do hear a dollar? Well—who'll give n two—two—two—two?

"What's the matter with your eye Can't you see it's worth ten dollars, if i worth a nickel? I got one. There's man who knows values! Two he say Now, gimme three—three—gimme thr —gimme three! First, second, last call (Down comes a mallet with a bang "My friend over here gets it for tw dollars. He'll never get another barga like that if he lives to be as old as Jona or was it Methusaleh."

He had a sing-song voice. He talke with his whole body. He brought in play his eyes, his head, he waved h arms, clapped his hands—but he so goods, and got many, many times mo than they were worth.

He knew all the tricks of pushing prices. He heard things people nev said. "I hear a fellow over there say knocked that watch down to Bill Jone because he was a friend of mine. We here's another at the same price, wh wants it? Don't all speak at once. N one can ever say I don't treat everybo alike."

In those days the auctioneer was actor. He always had a big audienc There were no movies, no radio, no aut for joy-riding over fine country roac The only competition was the 10, 20 a 30 cent shows, but they came so seldo Usually the auctioneer took the town storm and unloaded stores of merchandis that could never have been sold by a other method.

The desire for a bargain, something f almost nothing, is the strongest weakne in the human make-up. The auction w a gamble, it was the next best thing a "good dicker." It was more excitin than horse-trading or any local event.

When an auction was held in a villag the country folks drove in for mil around. It was usually held on Mark Day, when the town was full of count people. An auction was a big and thr ling event in their monotonous lives.

At the time the noisy auction was vogue, the booming voiced auctione who was clever at repartee, who had t brass, the gall, the nerve and the fro could get by with the most outlandi statements.

He was admired, looked up to and he in awe for his ability to command atte tion through a voice that nothing cou drown out or subdue. Even a gang devilish boys, shouting in at the door, d not stop the auctioneer, it only made more exciting and thrilling. As a hig falutin, bombastic salesman of pep a ginger he will live long in the memory a trail-blazer of skill.

In Automotive Advertising The News Is Detroit's Leader

ONE automobile for every five persons—practically equivalent to one for every family—that is the condition in Detroit. Small wonder then that the automotive advertisers use more space in the News than in any other Detroit paper. For the News city circulation is almost an exact parallel of the number of automobiles registered in Detroit.

Among the great passenger car advertisers who used more space in the News in 1925 than in any other Detroit Paper, are the following:

	Lines		Lines
Buick	74,242	Reo	24,136
Hudson & Essex	64,498	Cadillac	24,066
Chevrolet	48,104	Cleveland	12,474
Studebaker	79,758	Star	12,180
Dodge	49,630	Chandler	12,222
Nash	29,750	Lincoln	9,408
Willys-Overland	41,258	Elcar	2,226
Ford	29,344	Kissell	10,584
		Stearns-Knight	966

In total automotive advertising the News carried the splendid volume during 1925 of 1,472,744 lines, a lead of 299,684 lines over the second medium.

"Driverless" Buick Car Being Featured in Birmingham—Sears, Roebuck Use Rotogravure—Hudson-Essex Advertising "At Your Door" Prices

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

A "DRIVERLESS" Buick car appeared on the streets of Birmingham the other day. It started its trip just at the noon hour when crowds were thronging and continued until three p. m.

The same morning newspaper advertising invited the public to be on watch for the unique sight. The copy explained that Johnny Hines, the moving picture star, has driven a Buick and used Firestone cords. It was signed by the Birmingham dealer.

This stunt is being staged in many leading cities. It sets tongues wagging.

Getting the right type of men is a problem with many concerns.

The J. C. Penney Company, Inc., large chain of department stores is now utilizing run-of-paper display to uncover possible human material. The company takes 6½ inches on three columns to outline just what it wants in detail and the opportunity.

Hand-lettered copy with a sub-head, "Wanted: men who can grow into a partnership" has been worked out with much care. A booklet, "The next 10 years" is sent on request.

Space is allowed for the insertion of the name of the company representative, hotel and date he will be in town to talk with prospects.

A Sears, Roebuck & Co. advertisement without a price! And in newspaper rotogravure!

A full page and a 1,000-line advertisement in December proved satisfactory to the company's new retail department store, located several miles out of the center of Kansas City, that this form of advertising will be continued.

The new store, according to P. F. Park, the advertising manager, is carrying a higher grade line than mail order departments of the company. It wanted to make an appeal to the type of people who do not hesitate to pay the best prices for merchandise.

Rotogravure was decided upon to carry the personality and magnitude of the store quickly to everybody in that territory. A general view of the front and many interior pictures were published. The art and layout were designed to interest the substantial citizen rather than the bargain hunter. No prices were mentioned.

This is credited with having a positive influence on the drawing of thousands of people from as far away as 100 miles to visit the store. Many of the cars were parked in the company's free parking station.

The store has decided to use rotogravure in the future for its highest class merchandise.

Is Friday "fish day"? Not in Milwaukee.

Small-space copy in the Journal tempts the public to try Gorton's Ready-to-fry Codfish Cakes or Gorton's Salad Fish on Wednesday at the Milwaukee Athletic Club, Plankinton Hotel, Aberdeen Hotel, California Coffee Shop, Campbell's Lunch and Plankinton Arcade Cafeteria.

In Chattanooga, Tenn., the Squibb drug stores are offering a gift box containing Fitch's Lemon Cleansing Cream, Tonique Superbe, Shampoo, La Foma and Lilac Royal Toilet Water free to the first women who call and buy any Fitch product.

Mail order testimonial advertising is being tried out by Lever Brothers as a result of shifting their Rinso account to a large New York mail order agency.

Halftones of women using the product are accompanied with localized testimonials which give the street and address of some local woman who apparently sponsors the copy.

"It's shredded Wheat time in Blankville," says a small advertisement in a Michigan city. Now is your chance to buy your favorite whole wheat food, Shredded Wheat at a special customer-attracting price and get free one package of Biscuit and one Shopping Bag with every two-box purchase of Shredded Wheat. This is an unusual offer and will not last long."

Essex's Smart Copy

This gives the salesmen an excellent oportunity to get in larger stocks and more window displays.

Regular display space is being used by the Yellow Cab Company to talk to prospective drivers over the shoulder of the public.

Good-natured men who smile a lot, who are sensible and reliable, who have families, and who will rended real service, are specified. Such are given an invitation to apply to the company's employment office.

A bread concern in an eastern city has made a deal with the local electric utility for a premium drive, in which the bread company through liberal space is to give for a limited period a cash saving of $1.25 on a nationally known electric toaster ordinarily sold for $9.25.

Any consumer may save five wrappers of the bread or cake and take them to any office of the utility with $8 cash and get the toaster. Further, service customers of the utility are permitted to obtain the toaster, if preferred, by handing in the wrappers and paying $1 down, the balance over a period.

The head of a smiling man puffing on a Blackstone cigar in seven different positions in one advertisement makes the latest half page in the new Waitt & Bond schedule out of the ordinary.

Under each placement of the same head is recorded a selling point. Sunday papers are given a large part of the copy, which is being extended to new territories.

Complete sets of silverware now may be bought for one dollar down and the balance of one dollar a week under a new "thrift plan" being offered by a number of stores in connection with a silver national advertiser.

Several department stores now are handling, displaying and advertising nationally known makes of automobiles.

The announcement through full pages across the country of "A. Y. D." (at your door) prices on Hudson and Essex cars last month marks a departure which probably will be followed in time by other motor car makers.

"The price you pay to drive away," including equipment, freight and war tax, is given in such bold, black type that the consumer knows exactly what to figure on.

Many another trade custom, which is continued only because it has always been done, could be banished with similar purchase of bold newspaper space.

An opportunity for the public to "trade in" old fixtures and receive a 25 per cent allowance on Riddle Fitments, thereby giving the public a bargain and retiring the antiquated fixtures, is being offered by Riddle in connection with electrical dealers. Specific fixtures with specific prices are shown.

COURT PHOTOS BARRED IN ENGLAND

Parliament Passes Measure Restricting Making of Pictures Or Sketches Without Consent of Presiding Judge

By HUGH J. HARLEY

New restrictions concerning the making of photographs or sketches in British Court rooms are likely to affect the supply of news pictures from the British Isles. Parliament has passed and the King has approved the new Criminal Justice Act prohibiting the making of pictures of any kind in Court without permission of the Judge. The Act applies equally to the publication of such a picture or sketch. The fine is £50.

The passage of the clause was featured by efforts to prevent the publication of pictures of persons on trial or witnesses against them in the Courts under any circumstances and was marked by a sharp debate revealing a very strong sentiment against the manufacture of new crimes and offenses by Parliament.

The Newspapers Proprietors Association made an effort to limit the prohibition against taking photographs in or around the courts to places not a part of the highway, on the ground that an effort should be made specifically to define this new offense. They failed.

New Sunday Paper in Florida

Serving a State

Now~ early distribution throughout Florida with a "Bulldog"

Steaming out of Jacksonville every night, with shrill whistles and clanging bells, the big trains of the South are on their way. Back in the baggage cars, stacked up ready to be thrown off at all points down the line, are bundles of newspapers—the "Bulldog" edition of the Florida Times-Union.

Delivered to homes and offices—on sale at news-stands throughout the state seven or eight hours ahead of previous schedule, the Florida Times-Union now reaches its readers hundreds of miles from Jacksonville in time to influence their buying for the day.

Already the first choice of advertisers in Florida by reason of its supremacy in city and state circulation, the Times-Union now adds earlier distribution to its complete coverage.

K. C. Star for Sale About Big Business Does It Worry You? A Puzzled Countess

By Arthur Brisbane

COLONEL NELSON'S daughter is dead and now under the terms of Nelson's will the Kansas City Star that he created must be sold.

When Nelson was alive and in place, under the management of his son-in-law and his daughter, Mr and Mrs. Kirkwood, you could not have bought an editorial column in the Kansas City Star, to change its policy on a public question, for a million dollars.

Now the entire paper, including the editorial page, is for sale.

THE Star is powerful over several states. Some big railroad, grain, banking and packing combination might think it worth while "to take it in." The trouble is that a newspaper "taken in" by high finance is apt to take sick and die. High finance selects as editor, "one of our kind," and that kind can't run a newspaper. The question would bother Nelson if he were here. He was a good American and would not like the power he created to get into the wrong hands.

This writer remembers Nelson as he came up from his basement pressroom in his shirt sleeves to interview "the young Eastern capitalist building a seven-story brick 'skyscraper' at the corner of Seventh and Delaware, and another on Ninth street, near Wyandotte."

Nelson didn't dream that he was building a newspaper destined to be worth millions of dollars. Everything that Nelson had, newspapers, money, stocks, lands, now that his wife and only daughter are dead, goes to Kansas City, where he got his start. Nelson was a good American, courageous, honest and grateful. Therefore he was able to build a powerful newspaper.

DOES the growth of big business worry you?

Consider the automobile business, which is certainly BIG.

Five hundred different kinds of automobiles have disappeared from the market within twenty-five years.

In 1923 eighty-six different makes of cars were shown in the National Automobile Show. In 1923, sixty-six makes; only fifty-seven in 1924, and in the last show only fifty.

What have been the results of concentrating the automobile business in fewer hands?

Detroit automobile makers at this moment employ 60,000 more men, at high wages, than they did in the same week last year.

The output of cars is steadily increasing, prices are lower than ever. Ford, the biggest maker, and perhaps the richest man in the world, sells more cars than all other automobile makers put together, and sells at the lowest prices.

Business must be big, and big business should be encouraged by the Government, watched and controlled by the people.

If they haven't brains enough for that, they wouldn't have enough to control little business.

A BEWILDERED woman is the Countess Catheart.

Because she had eloped with the Earl of Craven, not her husband, she was locked up at Ellis Island and he was allowed to come in. "Why," she asked, "do you stop me?" The answer came, you stop me?" The answer came, "We cannot endure immorality in this proud country."

She got in eventually, edified by high morality no doubt, and was invited to a New York wild party, where the story goes, to a mixed crowd of men and women she beheld a nude dancing actress taking a bath in champagne filled with [illegible]

The giver of New York's wild party, by the way, denies that the young lady bathed in the champagne. He says the bath tub was only full of ginger ale.

Invitations to the party, however, one of which this writer has seen, quite plainly that everything would be supplied in abundance. The stretchers, which is finding the [illegible] makes that an enjoyable time for all had been planned.

MODIFICATION MOVE BLAMED ON GOVERNORS

Methodist Church Board Scores 'Lawless' New York and Baltimore in Scathing Report

JOHNSON SURVEY HIT

Prohibition Inquiry by House Favored; Wets Wary; Foresee 'Whitewash' From Committee

By Arthur Hachten
Staff Correspondent Universal Service

WASHINGTON, Feb. 28.—Full responsibility for the nationwide agitation for modification of the prohibition regime was heaped on "lawless" New York and Baltimore by officials of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church in a statement issued tonight.

Governors Smith of New York and Ritchie of Maryland were named as the leaders of a prohibition "nullification program" in the attack by Bishop James Cannon Jr., the Rev. Thomas H. Lewis, Bishop William F. McDowell, Dr Clarence True Wilson and Bishop W. M. Bell.

ADD FUEL TO WAR

"Coming on the eve of a meeting tomorrow of the House committee on alcoholic liquor traffic, at which plans will be made for a survey of prohibition results, the drys' attack added fuel to the raging warfare in Congress over Volstead[illegible]

The church is in favor of the projected inquiry. It believes funds should be appropriated for an investigation. Wets in Congress are wary of the work of the committee, reasoning it is overwhelmingly dry. They foresee a "whitewash" for prohibition.

Emphatic repudiation of the so-called Johnson report, issued by the Research Department of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, was made in the Drys' statement.

Attention was called to the disapproval of findings by the Johnson investigators by the administrative committee of the Church Council

'LAWLESS NEW YORK'

Of the Johnson investigators the Methodist-Episcopal Board said

"They were dominated and apparently overwhelmed by the influence and conditions prevailing in the lawless 'New York' section of the country. [illegible] disgrace to [illegible] conditions [illegible] enforcement of Gov. Smith's prohibition enforcement law was repealed because vulgarity and indecency are exploited on the stage in the theaters.

For Results in Advertising
Turn to the Ludlow!

Here is a test of your advertising—do you take pride in your composition?

Clean, well laid out advertisements, with headings in distinctive full-width faces please your advertisers—make their advertisements easier to read, more attractive and more effective.

Of course this all means more business for you.

The Ludlow produces these faces as you want them in any size from 6 to 60 point cast on slugs. It is this ability that has made the Ludlow the choice of America's foremost newspapers.

To know what the Ludlow is doing in these newspapers is to appreciate what the Ludlow will do for you. We will show you on request.

Highest Circulation in a year in the history of

The New York Times

The New York Times, strictly a newspaper, has assembled this unprecedentedly large group of readers of the highest quality solely because of its enterprise and accuracy in gathering the news.

The advertising volume of The New York Times in 1925, a total of 28,200,444 lines, also constituted a record; and the margin by which The Times led the second New York newspaper, 10,963,382 lines, established a third record.

In January and February this year The New York Times published 4,932,366 agate lines of advertising, 707,688 lines more than in the corresponding months of last year and 1,878,122 lines in excess of the second New York newspaper.

Advertisements submitted for publication in The New York Times are subject to censorship. Thousands are declined as fraudulent, misleading or questionable.

 * * I have been a daily reader of The New York Times for nearly forty years. I have had steadfast and increasing pride, as an American citizen, in its dignity, its splendid enterprise, its high-mindedness, its fine vision of its function as a great teacher of the people. * * Edwin A. Alderman, President, University of Virginia, Charlottesville.*

Analyzing an Eminent Situation—

To gain the leading position as an advertising medium among ALL the six day newspapers in the United States indicates more than mere volume of circulation.

While admittedly enjoying the greatest circulation in the State of New Jersey, the NEWARK EVENING NEWS has achieved National Leadership in Advertising because of its wholesome character as a newspaper and because of its influence IN THE HOMES of the thinking and buying public.

The Advertising Classifications in which it leads ALL newspapers in the United States (as the verified 1925 record shows) is a true index of this fact.

Let us analyze:

FIRST in Classified Advertising proves its intensive reader interest;

FIRST in Automobile Advertising proves the purchasing power of its readers;

FIRST in Food Advertising
proves its influence in the HOME;

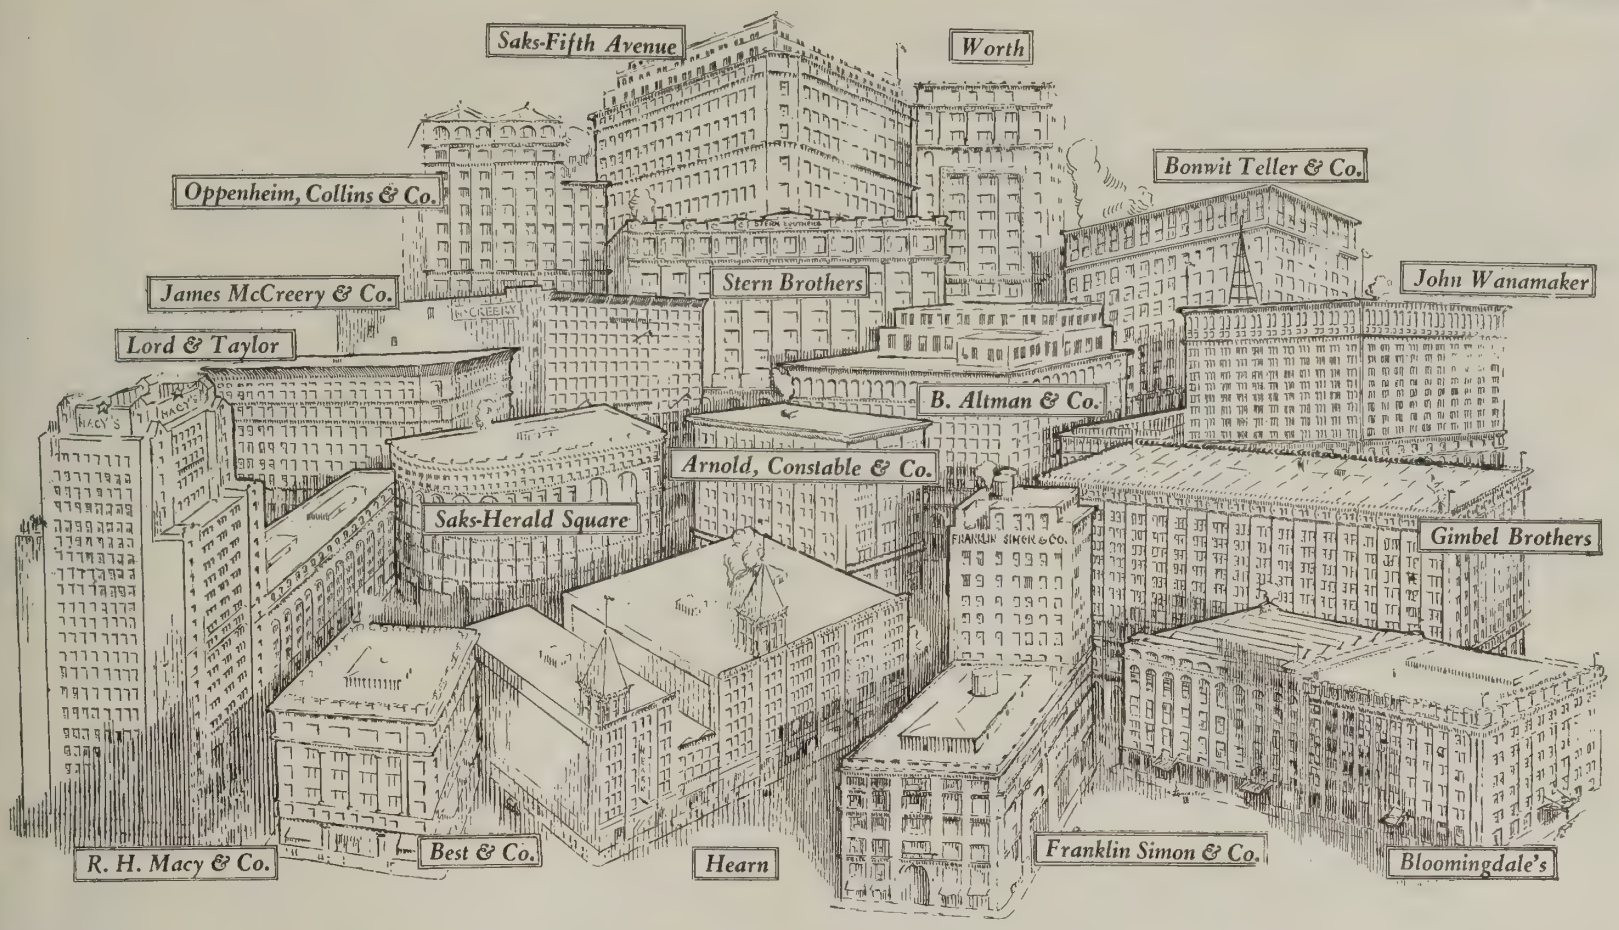
FIRST in National Advertising proves that its power is very generally recognized outside its own territory.



Advertising science has developed to the point where advertisers analyze their markets and carefully choose their mediums. The result is seen in the remarkable record of achievement shown above.

What Kind of People Are WORLD* Readers?

A Cross-Section of the New Yorkers Who Make These Big Stores Possible

*THE WORLD
Morning—Sunday
THE EVENING WORLD

THE above group of department stores represent, collectively, the most important body of merchants in America. They did a gross business last year of approximately $370,000,000. It has been estimated that they invested upward of $10,000,000 for advertising space in the eleven leading newspapers of the city, or from $7.00 to $8.00 per annum for every family in Greater New York.

Advertising with these merchants long since ceased to be a matter of guesswork. It is one of the most scientifically worked out phases of their business; because merchandise is of variable value, whereas advertising is a fixed-priced commodity, and the problem is not how it can be made to produce results to-day, by reason of prevailing conditions, but how it can be made to pay consistently 365 days a year.

Every dollar expended in newspaper space by a department store is expected to produce concrete results in sales within forty-eight hours. No item of investment (or expenditure, if you will) is more closely watched than the advertising budget of the big store. It is usually the owner's direct responsibility.

These seventeen stores, influenced solely by the experience of many years, placed 22.5% of all their advertising in 1925 in THE WORLD and THE EVENING WORLD.

Out of a total of 29,000,000 lines of space, WORLD SERVICE received 6,571,000 lines. Assuming the laborer to be worthy of his hire, it is logical to suppose that America's foremost group of merchants held THE WORLD and THE EVENING WORLD responsible for 22.5% of their total sales of $370,000,000, or $84,000,000—an impressive return for any two papers to produce as part of their year's work, especially when we consider that this sum is divided among only seventeen stores.

This statement conveys an important message to two classes of advertisers:

A—The smaller local merchant, to whom the precept of the larger advertiser, based on patiently tried-out experience, is the only dependable guidepost to which he can reliably look for intelligent direction; and

B—The national advertiser, who can never hope to have the intimate knowledge of the New York market possessed by the local merchants, and who must look to these very merchants for precedent in entering this market.

This information goes one step further, however. The group above is made up of stores catering to every class of buyer in New York—both extremes of purchasing power are represented, and, as between classes, there is no violent fluctuation in the percentage of total lineage represented by WORLD space.

It would seem, therefore, that a cross-section of the great mass of customers who make these big stores possible is a true picture of the typical reader of THE WORLD and THE EVENING WORLD—the average, well-to-do, prosperous New Yorker, the very backbone of all the city's vast commerce.

Simple As A-B-C

First in the six-day field in cities of 50,000 to 75,000 population you find The Johnstown Tribune with a record of more than 11,000,000 lines of advertising during 1925.

Faithfully gathering the News that's fit for publication and conservatively placing it before the public, year after year, has brought to The Tribune that reader confidence so earnestly sought by every good newspaper.

The result is a circulation coverage of its Trade Territory that is seldom equaled and nowhere excelled—and advertisers are taking advantage

[In Johnstown—a leading Pennsylvania Industrial Center—and surrounding territory The Tribune is the Big Home Newspaper that practically everybody reads.]

Figures That Tell a Convincing Story

Here is a detailed statement of the advertising figures in Washington, D. C., for the year 1925 — showing again the Star's overwhelming supremacy in this field — and with a total linage that ranks Washington as the fifth city, and the Star as the fifth newspaper in the United States in volume of advertising carried.

NOTE—News not published Labor Day, Thanksgiving and Christmas, 1925

An analysis of the figures is interesting for it shows how in every department of advertising—Display and Classified—the Star leads the field.

For instance—

In Display advertising the Star carried 21,155,441 lines—while the four other papers together printed only 21,472,347 lines. The Star's lead over the second paper was 12,467,533 lines.

In Classified advertising the Star carried 5,413,757 lines—while the four other papers together only printed 4,545,804 lines. The Star's lead over the second was 3,705,608 lines.

Thus the Star carried within 316,906 lines as much Display advertising as all the other Washington papers combined; and 867,949 MORE lines of Classified advertising than all the other Washington newspapers combined. Or a total of 551,047 lines MORE ADVERTISING OF ALL KINDS THAN ALL THE OTHER PAPERS COMBINED. This, too, in the face of much advertising which the Star declined as not admissible to its columns.

Certainly here is the proof of the value of advertising in Washington and the Star's commanding supremacy in its field.

The Evening Star.

An Unfailing Gauge for Medium and Buying Power

1,853,264 LINES

From 5 Stores

In a 35,000 Town

There are five department stores serving Bloomington and its trading territory who backed their belief in the pulling power of The Daily Pantagraph and the ability of the people of this rich section to purchase the merchandise offered, by using 1,853,264 lines of advertising in this paper alone, in 1925. This is an average of 370,653 lines or 26,475 inches for each store, a record unequalled by any paper in Illinois outside of Chicago.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

ELMER E. CONRATH, editor and publisher of the Cuba (N. Y.) Patriot and Free Press is one of the most widely known weekly newspaper publishers in the Empire State. His recent election to the presidency of the New York State Press Association comes as a fitting tribute to his efforts as a champion of the newspaper industry.

ELMER E. CONRATH

Of late, Editor Conrath has gained nation-wide prominence through the active part he has taken in opposing government competition in the printing of stamped envelopes. At the hearing held recently in Washington, the Cuba publisher attended as a representative of the National Editorial Association for the purpose of presenting the side of the country printers in their controversy with the Post Office Department over the printing of corner cards on envelopes.

The new president of the New York Press Association started his career as a farm hand and amateur printer. At various times he has held the position of cook in a lumber camp, carpenter, teacher, and later a full-fledged printer, from which position he went into the reportorial field and for 18 years was at the editorial desk of the Johnstown (Pa.) Daily Tribune.

Previous to purchasing the Cuba Patriot and Free Press, Mr. Conrath was for three years editor-and-chief of the Johnstown Daily Leader. Since taking over the editorship of the Patriot and Free Press, he has established it as one of New York's livest weeklies.

A Feature Service—and Something More!

CENTRAL PRESS does not feel that its whole duty towards its clients is discharged when the daily package of news mats, cartoons and features is placed in the mails.

Last week a West Virginia paper wrote that it desired three mats each of five prominent persons of the state, and could we supply them? We could. Cuts of all five were in our morgue. Three sets of mats were struck off and mailed to this paper within an hour after the request was received. There was no charge. This was a part of our regular service.

A Pennsylvania paper sent in an S O S call for a cut of a Canadian college professor who was shortly to visit its town on an important mission. Among the 150,000 pictures in our morgue was a photo of this man. We made and mailed the desired cut on the day the request was received. There was a charge of $1.50 for etching the cut.

A California paper, wishing to brush up its state morgue, wrote for mats of eight prominent Californians. They were supplied at once. No charge.

A large Florida daily which has its own engraving plant finds itself at the height of the season unable to handle all its engraving. CENTRAL PRESS is taking care of the overflow more cheaply and satisfactorily than could any plant nearer by.

News mats and features of varying degrees of quality may be had from many sources. But the additional service CENTRAL PRESS constantly renders its clients—often without charge—is as unique as it is invaluable.

H. H. CHANDLER

Pioneer Ad Man and Publisher Dies in Chicago

Hannibal H. Chandler, pioneer Chicago advertising man and publisher, died last week at the age of 81. He came to Chicago in 1865 and entered the employ of the old Chicago Times, of which his brother, Henry B. Chandler, was one of the publishers. Later he established the firm of H. O. Chandler & Co., which subsequently became Chandler, Lord & Co., the forerunner of the present-day Lord & Thomas.

In 1878 he established the Chicago Grocer, Chicago Medical Review and the Western Druggist. In 1883 he purchased the Farmer's Review which he published until his retirement in 1909.

Mr. Chandler is survived by his widow and two sons, Edwin W. Chandler chief auditor of the Audit Bureau of Circulations and H. H. J. Chandler, formerly with the Frank A. Munsey Company, and three daughters.

WILLIAM McK. BARBOUR

Advertising Manager of Minneapolis Tribune Dies of Heart Attack

William McK. Barbour, manager of advertising for the Minneapolis Tribune, died March 2, at his home in Minneapolis of apoplexy after a long illness.

Mr. Barbour was 61 years old, and was widely known throughout the country among advertising men and newspaper publishers.

It was as owner and publisher of the Colorado Springs (Col.) Gazette, that Mr. Barbour first entered the newspaper business. He continued as publisher for more than 10 years when he accepted the managership of advertising for the Minneapolis Journal in 1908. He became manager of advertising for the Minneapolis Tribune four years later, and after serving four years resigned to organize his own advertising agency in Los Angeles.

From Los Angeles, Mr. Barbour went to New York City where he was the advertising manager of the New York Globe, until its publication was discontinued in 1923, when it was merged with the Sun.

He then returned to the Minneapolis Tribune, as manager of advertising, but soon after his health began to fail.

He is survived by his widow, a daughter, one sister and three brothers.

Mrs. Mary Frances Runde

Mrs. Mary Frances Runde, wife of Fred J. Runde, vice-president and general manger of the Fourth Estate, died March 10, in Yonkers, after an illness of several years. Mrs. Runde was born in New York and was married on June 27, 1914. She was an artist and was well known as a designer of fashion plates. Besides her husband, she is survived by two sons.

Railroad Finance Expert Dies

Charles Remington, 49, for the last five years an expert on railroad finance on the Wall Street Journal, died in New York March 7. He started newspaper work 30 years ago on the Brooklyn Eagle, then prospected for a while in California before returning to journalism. He worked on the San Francisco Chronicle and other Western newspapers.

ROBERT K. THOMSON

Former Financial Editor, Cincinnati Times-Star, Dies In Alliance, O.

Many newspaper men attended the funeral Tuesday of Robert K. Thomson, former financial editor of the Cincinnati Times-Star, city editor of the Commercial Tribune and the official war correspondent with the sixth U. S. Infantry of Ft. Thomas at San Juan Hill in the Spanish American War in 1898.

Mr. Thomson dropped dead Sunday at Alliance, O., while conducting a financial drive for the Alliance College. The body was brought to Cincinnati for burial.

More than 30 years ago Thomson began his newspaper career on the Commercial Tribune. When the Spanish-American War was declared, he accompanied Ohio troops to Cuba, as a war correspondent. He was one of the few newspaper men who witnessed the battle of San Juan Hill.

At the close of the war Thomson joined the Cincinnati Enquirer. Later he joined the staff of the Times-Star and then returned to the Commercial as city editor.

During the World War Thomson did publicity work for the Red Cross in New York, and managed a number of publicity campaigns following the war.

FRANCIS A. RICHARDS

Former Washington Correspondent for Baltimore Sun Dead at 88

Francis A. Richards, 88, for 35 years representative of the Baltimore Sun until his voluntary retirement a few years ago, died in Washington, March 6.

He was born in Baltimore on Jan. 10, 1838. Graduating from the Baltimore City College, then a high school, he entered the office of the Baltimore Republican and Argus. He became managing editor at the age of 23. In 1865 he entered the Washington bureau of the Baltimore Sun.

At various periods Mr. Richardson had represented the Boston Post, the New York Tribune, the New Orleans Times-Picayune, the Atlanta Herald, and the Savannah News. In 1871 he wrote a historical work on his native city. In 1890 he became a member of the Board of Directors of the Washington Star. He married in 1861 Miss Margaret Howard. He was a charter member of the Gridiron Club.

Garde, Philadelphia Editor, Dead

C. Pierre Garde, 47, editor of the Camden, N. J. edition of the Philadelphia Inquirer, died suddenly March 8. With the exception of a year or so, during which he was connected with Hearst newspapers in New York and Chicago, Mr. Garde had been on the staff of the Inquirer as reporter, city editor and night editor.

The New York Times Has Installed Its 50th Standardized Intertype

EIGHT years ago, The New York Times made its first installation of Standardized Intertype Composing Machines. From time to time others were added, and on March 1st, 1926, four more Standardized Intertypes were ordered.

The Times now has fifty Intertypes in daily use and each of them standardized and fully interchangeable.

Repeat orders are the best proof of satisfaction. You cannot get real standardization unless you buy an Intertype. No standardized Intertype has ever become obsolete.

Have You Seen This New Dress?

THE TIMES came out recently in a new dress which promptly met with the approval of its readers. THE TIMES was probably the first newspaper to publish the opinions of registered optometrists testifying to the legibility of its columns. The matrices for this face were designed for them by Intertype and are now available to all users of slug-casting machines. Yes, they are cut with WIDE TEETH—hang straight and drop straight.

May we send you specimens of this new face?

Miles Vaughn, far eastern manager of the United Press, returned to Tokio this week, following a trip he started last December to appoint correspondents for the U. P. far eastern news report. Correspondents were appointed in Shanghai, Manila, Singapore, Penang, Batavia, and Samarang. C. S. Hirsch has been named Shangai U. P. correspondent, succeeding Burt Kuhn, who died recently. Vaughn represented the U. P. at Kuhn's funeral.

Joseph K. Smith of New York City and H. Price Crowe of St. Louis are recent additions to the foreign department of the United Press in New York.

How Arctic News Will Be Handled

Commander Richard E. Byrd, leader of one of the many Arctic exploration ventures scheduled for this summer, announced this week news of his expedition would be handled largely through the amateur stations of the American Radio Relay League, which would forward them to addresses. Exact schedules of these announcements would be made later, he said. Exclusive rights to the Byrd story have been obtained by the New York Times in association with the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and will be syndicated by Current News Features.

WITH THE GENERAL ADVERTISERS

Griner Hotels, Inc., Plan Extensive Use of Newspapers in Ad Drive—Virginia Chamber of Commerce Campaign Reaps Results—Willys-Knight Reaches 25,000,000 Through Papers

PLANS for the extensive use of daily and weekly newspapers throughout the United States in an advertising campaign to be launched within the next few months by Griner Hotels, Inc., for the promotion of its Dixie chain of hotels in Florida, Georgia and other southern states has been announced by D. G. Tinsley, director of advertising for the Griner corporation.

According to Mr. Tinsley, although all classes of mediums are expected to be used, the bulk of the promotion copy outside of hotel trade publications, will be placed in newspapers. Mr. Tinsley stated that present plans contemplate the use of space not only in newspapers circulating in the territory of particular links in the hotel chain. for advertising such individual units but also national advertising in a selected list of large dailies throughout the country of the entire Dixie chain, special attention being given to those papers which maintain travel and resort sections.

All advertising copy in the Griner campaign will be handled direct with the various newspapers by the central advertising office in Jacksonville, of which he is the head, Mr. Tinsley stated.

Mr. Tinsley has worked on many Southern dailies. Prior to going with the Griner corporation, he was for more than a year city editor of the Jacksonville Journal and before that assistant city editor of the Florida Times-Union. Before coming to Florida he was on the editorial staffs of the Birmingham Age-Herald, the Birmingham News and other papers and for several years was with the International News Service, having served as assistant bureau manager of that organization's Atlanta office and as bureau manager for over a year of its Kansas City office, having charge of the states of Missouri, Kansas, Texas and Oklahoma. Later he was with the I. N. S. in Chicago and also on the editorial staff of the Chicago Herald-Examiner.

Funds subscribed are given on a three-year contract basis by the organizations, assuring the continuance of the work for at least this period. Under the plan worked out by the State Chamber much money will be raised for advertising which has never been diverted to this channel before.

The first campaign placed by the Department of Publicity was spent 100 per cent in the newspapers and the general policy of the future, except where donors specify other mediums, will be to use the newspaper press in preference to other media.

More than 1,000 daily newspapers are to be used by the Willys-Knight company this year, according to a recent announcement of one of the officials of the company. Advertisements will be placed in papers ranging from leading metropolitan journals to small papers in county seats. More than 25,000,000 people are expected to be reached through the campaign. The 1926 campaign is said to be far in excess of the previous large advertising campaigns carried on by the company through the national press.

Forty-one Southern newspapers and about the same number on the Pacific Coast comprise the list being used in the campaign started this year by the American Chicle Company, Long Island City, N. Y., promoting "Dentyne" chewing gum. Robert Hersey, assistant advertising manager, informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week. The account is handled by the Newell-Emmett Company New York.

"This product was first advertised in the newspapers on the Pacific Coast last year," Mr. Hersey said. "Very satisfactory gains resulted, which we attribute very largely to the newspaper schedule."

W. O. Rutherford, vice-president in charge of sales, B. F. Goodrich Rubber Company, Akron, O., announced March 1 that L. A. McQueen, advertising manager will become assistant general manager, in charge of all sales, tire division Mr. McQueen will also continue general supervision over all advertising.

J. Henry Nortridge, president of the North Ridge Brush Company, Inc., announces the appointment as sales manager of Charles Bennett, formerly with the Dependable Wholesalers, Inc., New York Mr. Bennett has had fifteen years' experience in advertising and selling in Eastern, Central and Western states.

Net income of Robert Reis & Co. for 1925 amounted to $348,752, all of which was carried forward to the surplus account. In connection with the declaration of a preferred dividend of 1¾ per cent for the first quarter of 1926, Arthur M. Reis, the President, said that the earned surplus of the company was now over $870,000. In 1925, according to the report, 1,700 new accounts were opened.

375 Newspapers Taking NEA Service, Inc., Prohibition Poll—Star Newspaper Service Reporting Gold Rush—Syndicate Association to Meet April 17

MORE than 375 newspapers are taking a poll of the prohibition law, under the auspices of NEA Service, Inc. The newspapers on the list are claimed to embrace a territory with a population of more than 35,000,000.

The ballot seeks votes either in favor, repeal, or modification of the Prohibition Amendment.

The New York World, the Manhattan daily of the group, began the poll this week, with the ballots being printed Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. A string of 145 newspapers previously started their local poll. The territory covered by these newspapers has a population of 15,103,812. The combined circulation is 2,736,193, and by Tuesday evening they had received 300,000 ballots.

The Toronto Star obtained first stories exclusively on the rush to the Red Lake gold district. They sent a staff man, E. Paul Reading, to Red Lake by dog team, and his first dispatch was sent out in the same way. More dispatches followed. They are being distributed in the United States and Canada by the Star Newspaper Service, the syndicate department of the Toronto Star, in co-operation with the North American Newspaper Alliance.

Until this week there was no way of reaching the Red Lake field except by dog team. On March 3, however, a second Toronto Star correspondent, W. J. Scott, made the first aerial trip to the new gold field with J. V. Elliott, who is establishing air mail, freight, and passenger route.

E. Paul Reading has had 15 years' newspaper experience, including five years in China with Reuters. He was with the Strathcona Horse in the war and was wounded.

The Association of Newspaper Syndicates will hold a meeting in New York April 17, H. H. McClure, secretary, announced this week. David Lawrence, president of Current News Features, Inc., is association president. The group was organized last August for "common protection and promotion." Then George Matthew Adams, head of the George Matthew Adams Service, Inc., New York, was named vice-president, and Thomas W. Gerber, United Features Syndicate, treasurer. Mr. Gerber has since left the syndicate field to return to the sales staff of the United Press.

Another syndicate meeting scheduled for next month in New York is that of Associated Newspapers, which will hold its regular annual sessions at the Waldorf Astoria, April 22. It is a membership feature organization, claiming now about 45 newspaper members. W. O. Taylor, Boston Globe, is vice-president and acting president. A successor is to be chosen to the late Victor F. Lawson, Chicago Daily News publisher, who was president and one of the founders. W. L. McLean, Philadelphia Bulletin, is secretary-treasurer, and H. H. McClure, manager.

William Jennings Bryan earned $1,342.86 royalties from the Republic Syndicate, New York, according to an appraisal of the estate filed in the Miami, Fla., county court, March 5.

A series of 10 weekly cartoons entitled "Charleston Charlie," and signed by "Willmarth & Hays," is a new feature added to the regular mat copy of the Electricaster Service, Inc., Omaha, Neb. Another new contributor is Miss May Wilmoth, New York, writing a "Kiddie Korner."

"Living Inventions" is the title of a new Science Service daily feature written by Gaylord Johnson, author of the "Star People" and the "Sky Movies." The articles are illustrated with one-column pen and ink drawings by Mr. Johnson.

Charles E. Brown, formerly with the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, Wheeler Syndicate, Bell Syndicate and Readers' Syndicate, is now connected with the Cosmos Newspaper Syndicate, Inc., as assistant general manager.

John Dille, president of the National Newspaper Service, Chicago, has announced a new serial by Idah McGlone Gibson, entitled "The Love Trap."

Hallie Jenkins has been appointed middle western sales representative of Science Service, Inc., with headquarters at 1016 Central Avenue, Kansas City, Mo. She was on the staffs of the Kansas City Kansan and the Emporia Gazette.

Three new artists, J. Griffin, D. W. Duncan, J. Navoni, have signed contracts with Wheeler-Nicholson, Inc., and are working on three new features to be announced later.

Herbert Corey has returned from a trip to Europe and has resumed his "Manhattan Days and Nights," a daily New York life column written for Associated Newspapers. While on the Continent he wrote a series of travel articles.

"Why the Weather," Science Service feature explaining the weather and its causes, is now being mailed daily from Washington instead of weekly. Dr. Charles F. Brooks, professor of meteorology at Clark University, Worcester, Mass., the author, is spending three weeks at the headquarters of the U. S. Weather Bureau in Washington in co-operative research upon weather prediction.

Dr. Arthur Dean, author of "Your Boy and Your Girl," a feature issued by the National Newspaper Service, Chicago, has just completed a lecture tour for the Booth papers in Michigan.

The first radio program service by telegraph has been established by Audio Service, Chicago, as part of its service. Bulletins on late programs are being sent without extra charge to subscribers. Among the recent programs "covered" in this manner were the Congressional Wet vs. Dry debates, the broadcasting of the Moscow Musical Art Studio, the Associated Collegiate Glee Club concert and "The Miracle."

H. I. Phillips, writer of "The Once Over" and "The Sun Dial" columns, returned to New York this week from a three weeks' trip to Florida and Cuba. His work is handled by Associated Newspapers.

Andrew C. Miller, of Toronto, head of the Miller Newspaper Syndicate in Toronto, with Mrs. Miller, was a recent visitor to Richmond and were the guests of Frank D. Woodworth, telegraph editor of the Times-Dispatch, and Mrs. Woodworth. Mr. Miller is a veteran of the Boer War, having served with the Canadian troops in Lord Strathcona's Horse in South Africa.

Florida ought to remember that if she didn't lure rich Americans to her shores they would have to go to France and Italy and help pay back the money we lent in war time.—New York Herald Tribune.

ADVERTISING AGENCY AFFAIRS

Sir Charles Higham to Arrive in New York April 5—Edmund D. Wood, Elected President Cole-MacDonald-Wood—Capehart-Carey Corporation Opens New England Branch

SIR CHARLES HIGHAM, head of Charles F. Higham Limited, London advertising agency, with Gerald Kingsley, chairman of the India Tea Association, will arrive in this country about April 5 on the S. S. Leviathan. Soon after his arrival he will be entertained by the Advertising Club of New York, and the Poor Richard Club of Philadelphia, according to present plans.

Sir Charles' engagements follow: Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce luncheon speech, April 9; Washington, April 11-12-13; Advertising Club of Baltimore speech, April 14; New York, April 14-18; Cleveland, April 19; Pittsburgh Advertising Club speech, April 20. He will also visit Detroit and Cincinnati.

"The increase in the sale of British Teas in the United States is about fourfold over what it was when I first started my newspaper campaign in your country, and further the whole of the results of this campaign have come from newspaper advertising," Sir Charles stated.

Edmund D. Wood, vice-president of Cole-MacDonald-Wood, Inc., Detroit advertising agency, has been elected president of the company. Prior to the formation of the agency, Mr. Wood served for 15 years as a sales and advertising executive in the automotive industry and also national advertising agencies.

Arthur W. Ramsdell, for the past two years director of research and an account executive with the Campbell-Ewald Company, has joined the agency as vice-president and general manager. Another addition to the Cole-MacDonald-Wood forces is Lee Thompson, assistant advertising manager of the Truscon Steel Company, Youngstown, O., and formerly advertising manager of the Larrowe Milling Company of Detroit.

F. H. Clark, has rejoined the Botsford-Constantine Company as art director. He will have his headquarters in Portland. He has been drawing advertisement illustrations in Chicago.

The Capehart-Carey Corporation of New York has opened a New England branch at 120 Boylston street, Boston. Messrs. Paul H. Hines and Victor B. Klefbeck will have charge of this office, both of whom are well-known in newspaper work. Hines has served as reporter and news editor on the Boston Post, Boston Herald and the Lincoln (Neb.) Daily Star. Klefbeck has been on the Boston Traveler, Boston Herald and Boston American.

The Herbert B. Carpenter Advertising Agency, Dallas, has been changed to the Carpenter-Rogers Company, advertising, merchandising and business counselors. President Carpenter of the firm announced H. A. Rogers as a member. Rogers for several years has been sales and advertising manager of the Davis Hat Company, and previously was with the Southwestern Advertising Agency. Carpenter-Rogers Company has offices at 513-17 Santa Fe building.

COOLIDGE IS GUEST OF NEWS WRITERS

White House Correspondents Association Gives Dinner In Honor of Chief Executive—Nevin Succeeds Durno as President

President Coolidge was the principal guest of honor at the annual banquet of the White House Correspondents' Association at the Mayflower Hotel, March 5. The cloture rule was in force throughout the evening and the only exception to this was in the case of the President.

The Executive had been informed previous to his remarks that the now famous White House spokesman was not invited and that there was to be no report of what he said. As a result the President talked freely and intimately.

George E. Durno of the International News Service, the retiring president of the association, opened the dinner, after which he turned the gavel over to John Edwin Nevin of the Washington Post, newly elected president. The entertainment presented during the evening was directed by J. Russell Young of the Evening Star, as ringmaster, assisted by Kirk Miller of the Times.

The real feature of the entertainment program was a brief skit, in which the White House spokesman played the leading role, and which concluded with a song rendered by George H. O'Connor accompanied by Matt Horne at the piano and a specially written song, which expressed the correspondents' hope that the President again would establish the Summer White House at Swampscott, Mass.

Other prominent guests present were Postmaster General New, Secretary of Commerce Hoover, Nicholas Longworth, Speaker of the House; Frank W. Stearns of Boston, Representative Sol Bloom of New York, Everett Sanders, secretary to the President; John H. Bartlett, First Assistant Postmaster General; Edward T. Clark, personal secretary to the President; Rudolph Forster, executive officer of the White House; F. Stewart Crawford, chief clerk of the White House; Capt. Adolphus Andrews, commander of the presidential yacht Mayflower; Maj. James F. Coupal, the President's personal physician, and Comdr. Joel T. Boone, medical officer of the yacht Mayflower.

Others present were officers, members and guests of the association.

—1,837,080 more lines than in 1924

DURING the last decade, the advertising volume of The Detroit Free Press has more than doubled—its circulation has nearly trebled.

A little over one decade ago, The Free Press erected its own ten-story building in the heart of downtown Detroit which was deemed sufficient to care for growth over at least a quarter century. In 1925 it occupied a splendid new block-long structure on Lafayette Boulevard, Detroit, erected at a cost exceeding $6,000,000.

These notes on progress clearly bespeak the ever-renewed confidence of the people and the merchants of Detroit, as well as the advertisers of the nation in one of America's oldest newspapers—The Detroit Free Press—the only morning paper in a city of 1,500,000.

in buying power classifications

During 1925, in all those classifications denoting purchasing ability, The Free Press led all other Detroit newspapers in the volume of advertising carried. These classifications with the advertising lineage carried are shown below.

To the Editors of America:

Whatever news reports you are arranging to carry on the many expeditions into the Arctic this spring, you will want Stefansson's great feature series on THE GREAT ARCTIC HIGHWAY.

This series of six page articles will explain, in a dramatic way, the possible results that can come from this wonderful year of exploration through the air, on the sea, and over the ice. Whether there are eight expeditions or ten, the real background for all of them will be this powerful series by Stefansson, the greatest living explorer-writer. His books on the North are translated into nearly all modern languages and everywhere accepted as authorities.

In this great feature series will be the following:

The 1926 Rush for the Arctic: In this article Stefansson will give a dramatic picture of the expeditions that will be in the North and what their general objectives are.

The Arctic as Frontier Between East and West: In this article the great highway of the North will be presented as both the frontier between the hemispheres and as the quick means of communication between them.

Natural Resources of the Arctic: What man will find in the Arctic—The great game preserves (the caribou, seal, whale, musk-ox, and other wild life on land and sea.

The Future Wealth of the Arctic: What man will be able to do with the natural resources—Reindeer breeding; domestication of the musk-ox; minerals; oils.

Under-Ice Boats in the Arctic: Stefansson will tell a great story of the possibilities of the submarine in the polar seas, basing his forecasts on what the submarines did in the Baltic during the war; how the ice boat can carry fuel to airplane stations and keep the harbors open.

The Empire of the North: In the concluding article the great explorer will give a forecast and summary of what the Arctic will mean ultimately in world progress.

Each article will be very fully illustrated by new and unusual pictures and maps. The material will be sent either as mats or in the form of typewritten manuscript, with photographic prints for your own set-up and make-up.

The date of release will depend on news developments from the expeditions that go to the Arctic, but orders and options can be placed immediately by telegraph collect.

URGES IMPARTIAL REPORTING

Chicago News Man Tells Student "to Know Nothing and Write Facts"

Taking issue with the common quip that "a newspaper man should know everything," Fred A. Chappel, assistant managing editor of the Chicago Daily News told a lecture audience of embryo newspaper men and women at the Medill School of Journalism, of Northwestern University, Chicago, that "the first thing a newspaper man ought to know is nothing."

Speaking on the subject "What a Newspaper Man Ought to Know," Mr. Chappel said "the newspaper man's mind should at all times be a 'tabula rasa,' a virgin page on which the flux and flow of events may be recorded unmixed with prejudices, presuppositions and misconceptions.

"The newspaper man, must, like a philosopher, aim to see life clearly and see it whole and only by suppressing the individualistic viewpoint, with its tendency to error and confusion, can he become the dispassionate recorder of the day's history in its endless and vexing ramifications.

"The newspaper man must first be a historian and a historian does not make his facts. It is not his business to anticipate them. He may evaluate and classify them, but only after the event when the potential has become the actual.

"As a newspaper man he must keep clear of prophesy."

CONSUMER DEMAND IN

THE SOUTH

IS EVER INCREASING

The shifting of a substantial population southward was inevitable. The lure of speculation in the extreme South played a minor part in the general drift to a land that had been experiencing an extraordinary industrial development for more than a generation and, while creating another important merchandising territory, in no way minimized the untold opportunities for prosperity.

Industries have merely scratched the surface and in the not distant future the South will be the greatest industrial center in the world.

For every acre under the plow in every part of the South, there are many acres uncultivated. Two to four crops are produced instead of one as in the North, and forests replenish themselves two or three times as rapidly. Stock grazes outdoors the entire year.

The economic opportunities of the South are vast.

This territory of great purchasing power and still greater promise presents to the manufacturer a rich market for the distribution of his product.

The daily newspapers of the South offer you market information and merchandising cooperation.

SCHOOL STARTS COURSE IN PRESS AGENTRY

Instructor Pittman to Show Medill Students How to Write "Favorable" Propaganda — Public Relations Experts to Lecture

Following the announcement that the Medill School of Journalism of the Northwestern University had established a new course in "Public Relations," EDITOR & PUBLISHER requested Alfred Pittman, newly appointed instructor, to outline the work of the enterprise.

Following is his statement:

"The course is a recognition of the importance of business organizations and institutions of all sorts of their relations with the public at large, and it is devoted to the study of these relationships and the means of improving them.

"Everyone can recall businesses which have suffered from unfavorable attitudes on the part of the public and which have profited by changes in these attitudes. How have these changes come about, how is friendliness on the part of the public towards institutions of various types developed and maintained—that is what we shall consider.

"Obviously institutional advertising must come into the course and advertising of other kinds in some measure, for advertising certainly has been instrumental in bringing good will for institutions of many kinds. Changes of policy on the part of the institution have often been effective towards the same end—changes of policy towards employees, towards customers, towards the public at large; and the consideration of policies that make for a friendly public will take up a good deal of our time.

"Certainly the giving out of information about the institution which under earlier conditions might have been withheld, but which is interesting to the public and useful in the way of bringing mutual understanding form a proper part of such a course. Attention will be given to the preparation of such material not only for newspapers but for the other agencies through which it might be given out. It will be made very plain in the course that nothing could be more useless than trying to get articles into newspapers that the editors do not want in them or that the public does not want to read. The aim of the course is not so much to turn out finished, professional public relations men as to enable the students wherever they may find themselves in business to be more useful to both the business and the public by some understanding of the interaction between the two."

According to the official bulletin issued by the school to announce the class, the following statements are made: "The course is designed to assist those who may take up publicity or public relations work as a profession and those who may have need of skill in this kind of work in other positions. The case method is followed throughout the course. A public relations problem from actual experience is stated at one session, and at the next the methods used in meeting it, and the results obtained, are described. Students are regarded as public relations counsel and required to prepare between sessions recommendations for meeting these problems, and these are compared with the methods actually used. Sound and unsound methods are clearly distinguished. A number of men well known in the public relations field address the class during the course."

Michigan Daily Enlarging Plant

The Port Huron (Mich.) Times-Herald is remodelling its plant and will add a second story covering the whole of the present structure to house the editorial department and composing room. The new floor will contain 8,400 feet of floor space. The business office will take over the space vacated by the editorial department. Increased business necessitated the building expansion.

LETTERS FROM OUR READERS

Mats Improperly Protected

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I believe it will be greatly to the interest of national advertisers, advertising agencies, and the publishing fraternity in general, if I offer the suggestion that mats be mailed properly protected with cardboard of some substance. Since the first of the year, we have received only one mat from an advertising agency that has not been at least cracked and, as a rule, they are generally so badly damaged in the mails that it is impossible to make good casts from them.

This is particularly true in the cases of the large mats running to five-column size, but even the small ones do not seem to be immune from rough handling. As this letter is being written, I have before me a five-column mat on which the protecting cardboard was not nearly as heavy as the mat itself. As a result there are several cracks across the face of the mat, a corner is missing and an important price figure is obliterated.

Until such time as the mailers of these mats properly protect them with heavy cardboard on both sides, they must expect poor results. This experience is not confined to this paper as publishers elsewhere tell the same story, and I am writing this for mutual benefit.

Square Deal to Florida

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER—My hat is off and up to Florida Survey Number of EDITOR & PUBLISHER. You have, in fact, brought to the printed page the living, moving, progressing Florida. And that is a positive achievement.

I recently returned from Florida myself and this Special Survey Number comes as a log book of my own experiences and impressions; for, to my great satisfaction, I discover that your views of Florida's present and future are, in nearly every particular, identical with my own. And, as if to confirm our common views, I read an interview in the New York Sun yesterday with Col. Peter O. Knight of Tampa, which supports them in all essential details. As you know, there can be cited no higher authority than Col. Knight, for he bears the same relation to Florida's development that Æneas bore to the Trojan war: "all of which I saw and part of which I was."

Yours for giving Florida a square deal,
HERBERT S. HOUSTON.

An Aid to Better Understanding

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I think you have done a very useful thing in running the series on journalism schools, and I am sure through their publication the editors of the country will have a better understanding and appreciation of the work that is being done in the colleges and universities.

Florida's Potentialities

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: Permit me to express my enthusiastic appreciation as a great lover of Florida of the superb way in which you have handled your review of the state under the head of "Florida Rediscovered."

I have been living in Florida in the winter season for 12 or 15 years. I have been studying Florida for 40 years. But I am still constantly finding new and unique things on which the future progress and prosperity of the state are founded. It is a remarkable state; so remarkable that comparatively few even of the people of Florida themselves seem to have fully grasped its tremendous potentialities. At last the country at large is waking up to what Florida is and what it is to be.

To some extent the sub-division or town lot speculative feature has been carried too far. I have not in any way whatever been identified with it, not having bought in all the excitement of the last five or six years a single lot, except that on which my house is built and the adjoining lot, bought for the purpose of protecting my house lot from undesirable business development. I have seen others make fortunes, but I concluded years ago, and stuck to it, that my job was publishing the Manufacturers Record and not indulging in outside operations of any kind. I can, therefore, view the situation possibly with a greater degree of unselfish interest than a very large proportion of people who in one way or another are interested in Florida real estate activities.

Your splendid statement is bound to attract attention throughout the country, and I trust that it will do as much good to the EDITOR & PUBLISHER as it will inevitably do to the State of Florida.

Sincerely yours,
RICHARD H. EDMONDS,
Editor Manufacturers Record.

Conservative and Fair

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: I feel it my duty, and it is a great pleasure, to express to you my appreciation and gratitude as a loyal and working Floridian for your splendid number of EDITOR & PUBLISHER devoted to Florida and Florida journalism. Your estimate of the State, its activities and resources is conservative and fair and its treatment is brilliant. The story of newspapers and newspaper workers, as you say, is as thrilling as is the story of Florida's marvelous development. The State and the newspaper men owe to you a lasting debt of gratitude.

I want to thank you, too, for your treatment of the International Press Foundation. I fully realize the difficulty of analyzing and grasping this great dream and of—if possible—pulling it down to concrete fact and action, and I tremble at the task and the responsibility wished onto me as Chairman of the Board of Directors. All I can hope for is a fair deal and at least a withholding of judgment until we can work it out to a business-like conclusion. My first job is making sure of possession and the real underlying purpose; my second to determine the possibility of success. I am sure you will sympathize with me in this unselfish labor.

For your kindly and too generous remarks about myself and The Independent I could not feel other than prideful gratitude.

Lew B. Brown, Editor and Publisher, St. Petersburgh, Fla., Independent.

Florida Survey Appreciated

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: The Florida Development Edition of EDITOR & PUBLISHER presents one of the most comprehensive surveys of Uncle Sam's big toe it has been my good fortune to peruse. It is striking because it is sound in its presentation of facts. It has more than kept faith with Florida and it has kept faith with its readers, scattered to the far corners of our nation.

It appeals to me as something of far more importance than merely a sectional edition of a great newspaper trade publication. It is an encyclopedia and ready reference that should be of untold value to every advertising executive in the world. In brief, it is in keeping with the high standard set by EDITOR & PUBLISHER in the 20 years that I have known it in connection with newspaper work.

You and your entire organization are to be commended on a work so carefully planned and so thoroughly executed.

Cordially,
E. G. DENHAM,
Editor, Haines City (Fla.) Daily Herald.

PRESS VIEWS SOUGHT

Pennsylvania Democratic Papers Assist in Forming Party Policies

John N. Bigelow, chairman of the Pennsylvania State Democracy, has asked Democratic newspapers in the state to send representatives to a meeting of the state council to be held in Philadelphia March 13, to assist in forming party policies.

"I shall ask and solicit their views on all questions that arise," Mr. Bigelow said. "The journalistic point of view is always worthy of serious consideration and the influence of the press most powerful."

New Missouri Publishing Company

The Missouri Press Publishing Company has incorporated for $50,000 to do a general publishing business with headquarters in the New York Life building in Kansas City, Mo. The company also will publish the Missouri State Journal. E. D. Wilson is president.

Sergent Joins El Paso Dailies

Paul O. Sergent has joined the El Paso (Tex.) Herald and the El Paso Times as assistant general manager and director of advertising for the two papers. Mr. Sergent's 21 years of newspaper experience began on the Grand Rapids Press and covers employment in executive capacities with the Baltimore News, New York Herald and Louisville Herald-Post.

PUBLISHERS AGAIN DENIED PART IN RAILWAY MAIL PAY HEARINGS

New Application to Be Made Party to Case Filed With Interstate Commerce Commission Monday

WASHINGTON, March 11.—An order was issued Wednesday by the Interstate Commerce Commission denying application of the American Newspaper Publishers Association on behalf of 500 daily newspapers the right to intervene in the Railway Mail Pay proceeding. No reason for the denial was given in the official order.

There is now pending before the commission the petition of the American Publishers Conference representing several national associations of newspapers and magazine publishers, for the right to participate in the proceedings which involve possibilities of increases in second-class rates. The brief of the American Publishers Conference differs in several respects from that of the American Newspaper Publishers Association. According to the letter of transmittal, the petition of the conference is confined to the issues in the proceeding, namely, questions presented by the carriers regarding the reasonableness of Railway Mail Pay Rates.

The American Newspaper Publishers Association petition asked the right to put before the Commission evidence which would show the practices of the Postal Department regarding the transportation and distribution of the mail, particularly fourth class matter, requiring the carriers to furnish more expensive service than is regarded as necessary, resulting in excessive cost to the carriers, the Post Office Department and the public.

The American Publishers' Conference now in their brief that the publishers and other mail users are the real parties in interest for the reason that the compensation paid by the Post Office Department to the railroads is paid from postage collected from publishers and other mail users and that Congress, when it empowered the Interstate Commerce Commission by the act of July 28, 1916, to fix railway mail pay rates, did not intend to deny the right and privilege of publishers to present evidence and argument in opposition to increases in railway mail pay rates.

To show that Congress did not so intend, numerous citations are made from hearings before the Committees of Congress considering the question of railway mail pay rates, at which hearings publishers were permitted to appear in opposition to increases in railroad transportation on the theory that there was a direct connection between postage rates and railway mail pay rates and that any increases in the railway mail pay rates would result in increases in postage rates on second class mail matter.

In answer to the argument of railroads that the Postmaster General is the only necessary or proper party to represent the interest of mail shippers, the American Publishers' Conference called attention to the fact that the Postmaster General in his capacity as executive head of the postal establishment represents equally all interests, and that he does not represent mail shippers any more than he represents the rail carriers. They cite as an example the recent express case as illustrating this principle. In the express rate case before the Commission a short time ago the railroads desired additional compensation from the express company for carrying express. The express company did not represent the express shippers before the Commission, but all express shippers were made parties and had an opportunity to submit evidence and cross-examine the railroad witnesses. The publishers are asking this same privilege from the Interstate Commerce Commission that the express shippers had when the railroads desired greater compensation for carrying express.

The application for reconsideration is signed by A. C. Pearson, national chairman, and the following organizations are represented by the American Publishers' Conference: National Editorial Association, representing 12,000 small daily and weekly newspapers; Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association with 300 daily newspapers; Agricultural Publishers' Association, representing 100 farm papers; Associated Business Papers, Inc., representing 400 business and industrial papers, and the National Publishers, representing 300 national magazines.

A. N. P. A. PLANS MEET

Directors of Publisher Group Arrange April Events

ENGRAVING SCHOOL IS STARTED IN CHICAGO

Founded By Local A. N. P. A. Publishers—Six Months' Course offered for $150—C. L. Clayton Instructor

The Newspaper Photo-Engravers School, Inc., has been opened at 179 North Michigan avenue, under the direction of C. L. Clayton, a practical photo-engraver with many years' experience in the practice and teaching of the trade.

The course is to last for six months. Each student will pay tuition of $150. The school is endowed by the Chicago Local, American Newspaper Publishers' Association. The tuition is charged the student on the thought that unless a man pays for a thing he is apt to judge it less valuable.

By reason of the increased demand for photo-engravers because of the modern trend in newspapers, there is a shortage that must be met. Because no apprentices are taken in the newspapers' photo-engraving rooms, it was necessary to start a school to train young men, it was stated.

The school had 100 applicants, but as only 20 can be accommodated, the best material was selected.

The requirements are that the applicant be 18 years or over and that he have completed at least the grammar grades. The course will be divided equally between theory and practice and the plan is to turn out a man who at least knows the fundamentals of the business. It is thought that positions will be obtained readily, once a pupil has taken the six month's training.

The Chicago school is the second of its kind in the country, the other being located in Ithaca, N. Y., and supported by New York City publishers.

"RED TERROR" IS FICTION

So Declares Walter Duranty, Moscow Correspondent, New York Times

Fear of "police spies and Red Terror," played up in sensational journals, is newspaper fiction, according to Walter Duranty, Moscow correspondent, of the New York Times, who states that newspaper men in Russia most fear the landlord or grocer, because the cost of living is frightfully high. Mr. Duranty recently returned to this country on a visit.

It is difficult to get accurate and full information in Moscow, Mr. Duranty said, because of the constant change of personnel in the various governmental bureaus, which tends to make officials "quite unwilling to accept responsibility."

Mr. Duranty gave this description of a day's routine:

"One reads the six morning papers and calls at the Foreign Office in the morning, chats with callers during the afternoon and between 5 and 7 o'clock writes his dispatch. Occasionally one entertains friends at dinner, which is invariably followed by interesting discussions on the political and economical situation. Sometimes the day's routine includes a conference with the Foreign Minister. These conferences are similar to those held in Washington on Tuesday mornings. Statements are issued in the forms of Government bulletins, and individuals are rarely quoted."

During one day Mr. Duranty often speaks French, English, German and "ungrammatical Russian." More German is spoken than any other language at the Government offices, French and English tying for second place.

El Paso Post Has Carrier Paper

The El Paso (Tex.) Post on March 10, issued Vol. 1 No. 1 of the Junior Post, published "now and then" for its carriers and agents. Louis Swift is circulation manager. The Junior editorial policy is announced in the slogan "Not the lack of time, but the lack of energy to improve your time will keep you from making a successful carrier."

FIGHT CLEAN BOOKS BILL

New York Publishers Move on Legislators at Albany March 16

New York newspaper publishers, book publishers, and authors will assemble in Albany, March 16, to oppose the so-called clean books bill, Frederick W. Hume announced this week. The bill was introduced by Senator Martin J. Kennedy, and will be given a legislative committee hearing next Tuesday.

Representatives of the Allied Printing Trades Council and the Authors' League, Mr. Hume declared, as well as several individual authors and dramatists, will appear against the bill.

Mr. Hume said that the Kennedy bill was identical in principle and practically identical in substance with a bill introduced in 1923, 1924 and 1925, which failed of passage. He said that William A. DeFord had been retained as chief counsel for the hearing by opponents of the measure.

Assemblyman Alexander H. Garnjost, Republican, Westchester, introduced the bill in the Lower House.

Mayor Withdraws Police Cards

Mayor Frank X. Schwab of Buffalo has decided to cancel a long established custom of giving accredited newspaper men fire line and police passes. Instead, the mayor is going to issue at a cost of $5 each gold badges which will obtain these privileges. Any "reputable citizen" may obtain one of the badges.

Tabloid Readers Taught Manners

Re-election of Lynch Forecast

Re-election of James M. Lynch of Syracuse, N. Y., as president of the International Typographical Union by a larger majority than in 1924 is indicated in primary returns received at union headquarters, Indianapolis, it was announced Wednesday. The regular election will be held May 26. Endorsements of 436 local unions for the presidential nomination were received by Lynch, against 215 for Charles P. Howard of Chicago, former president. The voting indicated the re-election of the entire ticket of the "administration party."

Herald Tribune Circulators to Dine

The annual beeksteak dinner of the New York Herald-Tribune circulation department for members of the department and the city, county and suburban wholesale distributors will be held March 23 at Janssen's Hofbrau House. The committee in charge is headed by J. J. Gillen, chairman, and L. W. Schmidt, treasurer. Other members are L. Levy, J. Aarons, H. Hecht, Max Rockman, Charles Lowe and John Lange. Claude Sandkam, circulation manager, is honorary chairman.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

IN The New Republic for March 3, is "The Confessions of a Shirt-Stuffer." As the material most commonly employed to stuff shirts is news print this article ought to have considerable interest for every newspaper publisher.

The opening paragraph of the article does indicate one tendency which frequently shows itself in the press:

> We are in the midst of an orgy of undressing—material and spiritual. People everywhere are doing it. The disappointed washwoman, crossed in hopeless love, sighs out her tragedy to the readers of True Stories. The great ones of the earth bare their lives for the syndicates. But all are peeling off their garments and standing in the market place in their naked souls.

Here is the specific problem of the shirt-stuffer:

> When I took hold of Bunkus, he was just a large mass of perspiring flesh in a silk shirt. It was my business to remove the original crude contents of that shirt, treat them as one treats the contents of a stuffed tomato, add seasoning, salt and spices, and return them unobserved to the shirt. I had to extract the hog-slaughter from the Bunkus waistcoat and re-stuff it with a combination of statesman, orator, humorist, philanthropist and industrial saint.

The trick was turned and the shirt was stuffed only through the co-operation of newspaper publicity.

Of course the picture is overdrawn, but there is no use in denying that in some instances the press has been prostituted along the lines outlined in this article. The publicity here, as elsewhere, will doubtless bring about a cure of press paresis. Constant criticism of the press is bound to make the newspaper reader more critical of column contents. EDITOR & PUBLISHER, it may be remarked, is doing what it can and speaks in no uncertain terms about the worthless bunk that is often creeps into American newspapers. But the big kick has got to come from newspaper readers.

THE sudden death of Mrs. Laura Nelson Kirkwood in Baltimore has afforded the editor of The Nation an opportunity to print an editorial in his issue of March 10 in which the Kansas City Star and the Kansas City Times are said to have lost much of their prestige since Colonel Nelson's death. Such assertions in my opinion ought not to be made without a bill of details. Praise may be general but condemnation should be specific. In the same way any one who remarked that The Nation has lost much of its prestige since Oswald Garrison Vilard became its editor ought to be called upon to list the particular ways in which this prestige had been lost.

WHEN "Deadlines," that great newspaper classic in the field of fiction, it appeared from the pen of Henry Justin Smith, whose name will ever be associated with the Chicago Daily News, I gave the volume a fairly comprehensive review in this department. But a review of "Deadlines" in Vechernaya of Moscow even went the book one better as a piece of fiction. It shows "the crazy, terrible work carried by the American papermen."

A pirated translation of "Deadlines" is now being sold throughout Russia. In fact, it is being used by the Trotsky government through its Educational Bureau as a social document revealing the "domination of America by the Capitalistic press."

In a letter of protest to S. S. Raietsky of Moscow, one of the translators, Mr. Smith says:

> I appreciate your reference to "Deadlines" as "an artistic, bright document," but I am bound to object to the use of the book—especially when I gave no authority for any use of it at all—as bolshevist propaganda.
> You write that "Deadlines" "for the first time, perhaps, shows the professional tragedy of a journalist who is compelled to sacrifice his brain, his talent and his creative temperament to this horrible machine which is the capitalist press of our day."
> You write of "this monster apparatus which is used by the bourgeoisie (in America) as the strongest weapon of its class domination. The capitalistic newspaper helps not only to enslave those on whose backs is held the horrible pyramid of contemporary society, but also those who are forced to make this newspaper: the newspaper proletariat. About this proletariat speaks Henry Smith."
> My dear Mr. Raietsky, I protest that I never "spoke" about anything so terrible as a proletariat. I "spoke" only about some interesting people.
> You write that our crowd of newspaper men are in an "intellectual, financial, cultural and professional servitude, groaning under the oppression," etc.
> Mr. Raietsky! what bunk! To write such things, at a time when city editors are really groaning under an avalanche of youngsters determined to climb into the dreadful business! And where do you get that "servitude"? Anybody can quit whenever he likes. And I have seen people weep real tears because they had to quit.
> You write that I have "uncovered the horrors of the contemporary newspaper fabric!" I protest that the horrors in "Deadlines" are as scarce as the rubles I ought to be receiving at the present time from the soviet government.
> All of which leaves me no less grateful for a brilliant and difficult job of translation.

These remarks by Mr. Smith are certainly illuminating. How much publicity they will be given in Russia remains to be seen.

MOVE THE GOODS

Various methods of National Advertising are employed to stock the dealers, but it takes the newspaper to move the goods.

With the product of the manufacturer on the dealer's shelf, salesmanship has only begun.

If the selling is left entirely to the retailer the cost will likely be too high to make it worth his while to carry the merchandise, for the most important part of the sales appeal is in advertising and the message must be brought directly to the consuming public—the customers of your dealer.

This makes the final distribution of the goods a purely local matter and, since the selling and buying are both local, the logical medium for the delivery of the manufactured product is the local daily newspaper.

It is good practice to advertise the names of the dealers.

FROM STICKING TYPE TO RIVIERA VILLA IS STORY OF SIR POMEROY BURTON

Compositor on Brooklyn Citizen Became Managing Editor of New York World, Then Won Wealth and Title in Britain as Lord Northcliffe Aide

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

SIR POMEROY BURTON, a suave, well-dressed, gray haired British-American millionaire, sat last Saturday morning in his stateroom, 18 on B deck of the S.S. Lapland, about to cast off on a cruise through southern seas. After a brief visit to this country, divided between New York and Florida, he was returning to Villa Arethuse, his home on the Riviera which he had purchased two years ago from Prince Danilo of Montenegro.

A little more than 40 years ago, "Roy" Burton, as his friends then called him, was sticking type in the composing room of the Brooklyn Citizen. In 1884 he abruptly announced he was through with his composing stick, hurled it clattering down on the stone where he was working, and left to dig out an editorial position for himself on the Brooklyn Eagle.

From that date on he traveled steadily upwards in the newspaper business. He won wealth and his title in England, where he was for 15 years managing director of the Harmsworth publications in Britain and France, now owned by Lord Rothermere, brother of the famed Northcliffe.

On March 6, just before he sailed for his Riviera home, Sir Pomeroy told this writer he was at present thoroughly enjoying retirement from active newspaper work, but made it clear that as far as business was concerned, and money making, he hadn't yet stopped progressing.

Sir Pomeroy would talk of anything but his former business. His words were of electrical combines, backed by billions. He was a financier enjoying the excitements of amassing more wealth and the pleasures and interests money can bring. His was not a spirit of braggadocio, admitted; but of confidence, surely—bank-book confidence. He was a man of importance. Ship news photographers were asking permission to take his picture; he refused. His valet was straightening out his luggage while he talked, and a lady's maid busied herself preparing for Lady Burton's comfort during the voyage. A secretary brought in last minute letters to be signed and mailed before the steamship sailed away.

"I'm thoroughly enjoying my leisure," he said. "I have no dull moments. I am as full of interest now as when I was in the thick of the fray.

"No, I won't give you my opinion of American newspapers, except to say that newspaper properties here seem to be thriving greatly.

"I came back to the United States this time on a combination pleasure and business trip. I have financial interests here. In England I am particularly interested at present in electrical development, and

Sir Pomeroy Burton

I wanted to study the system of large scale cheap distribution of electricity here.

"One sight I witnessed that I enjoyed very much was the recent spectacular Wall street demonstration. We have no such interesting fireworks abroad."

Sir Pomeroy was born 60 years ago near Youngstown, O. When about 12 years old he became a printing apprentice on small newspapers in the Buckeye state. He was 18 when he decided he had gone as far as he could in the mechanical side of newspaper making and joined the Brooklyn Eagle staff. His first editorial position was that of fraternal editor. He chafed at the reins of this routine job and finally succeeded in getting himself assigned as Eagle correspondent at the National Guard Camp at Peekskill, N. Y. There he began to show the ability as a writer he had inherited from his mother, an author of local Ohio fame.

As the result of superlative work at the camp, Sir Pomeroy was promoted to assistant city editor of the Eagle on his return to Brooklyn. His next step was to head of the city desk. Then his work came to the attention of the elder Joseph Pulitzer, who made him city editor of the New York World.

When Lord Northcliffe made his first visit to the United States 20 years ago, Burton had risen to the position of managing editor of the World, and had left that newspaper to go over to the Hearst service. Lord Northcliffe, then Sir Alfred Harmsworth, said he wanted an editor who could vie with Ralph Blumenfeld, former Milwaukee newspaper man, who had became his greatest rival as editor of the London Daily Express.

"I'll loan you Burton," William Randolph Hearst said. Northcliffe accepted, but forgot to repay the loan.

On the London Daily Mail, Northcliffe's chief paper, the young American newspaper man soon became a dominant figure. After five years abroad he was made managing director of Associated Newspapers, Ltd., the Northcliffe chain of daily newspapers, weeklies and magazines.

By 1914, Sir Pomeroy had demonstrated a Midas touch in everything he handled. Then, aside from Lord Northcliffe's personal holdings, he owned all except an insignificant number of shares in the Daily Mail. When Sir Harold Harmsworth retired from the Daily Mail, Sir Pomeroy purchased his holdings. Soon afterward he purchased the Kennedy Jones shares, which gave him a position second only to Lord Northcliffe himself in importance.

Sir Pomeroy was knighted by King George in 1923 for services he performed during the war and immediately after peace was signed. Just before the United States declared war in 1917, he visited this country and for three months toured the Eastern and Middlewestern states, investigating conditions for his London newspaper and arousing interest in the Allied cause. He constantly fought against wartime censorship, demanding full publicity for the people on all information not of definite use to the enemy. He was a keen student of the labor situation in England, and in 1919 directed a big publicity drive in an effort to check the spread of labor unrest then developing throughout the industrial world.

Two years ago he resigned as managing director, but retains today the position of chairman of the board of directors of the Rothermere press.

"has improved the appearance of the advertising matter"

"Regarding the Model 26 Linotype purchased from you this past summer, we have congratulated ourselves frequently that we made the purchase, as it has helped us materially in setting advertising matter in our publications and also for commercial work. The thing that pleases me most is that I do not hear the foreman answer the question as to why it took so long to set a job; that his foundry type was all tied up and that the cases were empty. Furthermore, we are not wearing out our type used in publication work and, needless to say, the Model 26 has improved the appearance of the advertising matter appearing in publications printed by us."

KENDALL BILL TABLED IN COMMITTEE

Both Sides Agree On Move When Majority Refuses to Vote It Out Without Material Amendments—No Further Action Likely

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WASHINGTON, March 11.—Immediate prospect of favorable action on the Kendall Bill to restrict the printing and sale of stamped envelopes with complete "Corner Cards" by the Post Office Department vanished this week when the house Post Office Committee tabled the measure by unanimous agreement between its proponents and opponents.

When a majority of the Committee refused to vote the bill out unless it was amended materially, its supporters decided to permit it to rest in Committee without having it voted either up or down.

The National Editorial Association which backed the bill will probably seek further action later, although it is not believed that the legislation has any chance of becoming a law at this session of Congress.

CHARLES M. LINCOLN WITH N. Y. TIMES

Former New York Herald M. E. Will Take Charge of Syndication—Has Had Long Newspaper Career—Was Nine Years With World

Charles M. Lincoln, former managing editor of the New York Herald, this week became a member of the New York Times' staff, after a year and a half vacation from active newspaper work. His appointment was made by Adolph S. Ochs, publisher, who informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Mr. Lincoln would pay particular attention to the syndication of matter for the Times.

CHARLES M. LINCOLN

The Times however, has no intention of starting a regular newspaper syndicate, Mr. Ochs said, but explained that with increasing frequency stories arise, which require some syndication to finance their coverage. At present the Times is syndicating three Artic expeditions in co-operation with Current News Features, Inc.

Mr. Lincoln himself declined to discuss the nature of his new newspaper duties.

In accepting his present position, Mr. Lincoln is returning to the Times staff. From 1907 to 1910, he was Sunday editor of that newspaper.

Mr. Lincoln first came to New York from the Philadelphia Press, where he was associated for four years, part of the time as managing editor. There he attracted the attention of the younger James Gordon Bennett, who brought him to the Herald staff in 1896. For 12 years he was respectively city editor, news editor, and Sunday editor of the old Herald. Then, after his Sunday editorship of the Times, he was named managing editor of the New York World, following Caleb A. Van Ham in that executive position. He remained managing editor of the World for nine years, before resigning to return to the Herald as executive editor in 1920.

A native of Bath, Me., Mr. Lincoln began his newspaper career on the old New Haven Palladium.

Ex-Gov. Allen Heads Cruising College

Ex-Governor Henry J. Allen, proprietor of the Wichita (Kan.) Beacon, will head the faculty in charge of journalism on the "floating college" which sails for a cruise next October, the University Travel Association, announced in New York this week. Mr. Allen will also write a history of the cruise. The "floating college" will spend eight months visiting 30 foreign countries.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

—By PHILIP SCHUYLER—

"Local news is our chief interest"—S. D. Jones

SAMUEL D. JONES, manager of the Waco (Tex.) News-Tribune, a Fentress-Marsh newspaper, is temporarily in charge of the New York Morning Telegraph, which is now being managed under Fentress-Marsh supervision. C. E. Marsh, who was previously in charge, has returned to Texas, expecting to come back to New York, April 1. His partner, E. S. Fentress is scheduled to come to New York in April also to assist in directing the New York daily.

Mr. Jones arrived in New York, Feb. 28. It is his first visit to Manhattan. He has been manager of the Waco News-Tribune for the past 12 years, and was appointed manager of that paper in 1921. Prior to going to Waco he was with the Fort Worth Record, where he had his first newspaper experience. He started in the circulation department of the Record and was assistant general manager when he resigned to go to Waco. He declined to discuss affairs of the New York Telegraph.

Since 1917, when the News-Tribune became one of the Fentress-Marsh chain, circulation has doubled, according to Mr. Jones.

This circulation boost, accomplished without use of premiums or prize contests, is a story of local concentration and worth consideration. The News-Tribune, in common with many another small town daily in the shadow of nearby big city competition, must rely primarily on complete and careful local coverage to bring readers to the fold. Within a radius of 50 miles, Mr. Jones is threatened by metropolitan circulation in the North from Forth Worth and Dallas, and in the South from Houston and San Antonio.

"We are, because we must be, strictly a local town," Mr. Jones explained. "Local news is our chief interest. We boil it down and carry lots of it. We stay in our own back yard and plug.

"Texas newspapers are everywhere very much under-rated, I believe. Yet they all take care of their respective fields in a very capable manner. We rarely stick our nose into the bloody side of things, to be sure. Texas is still a growing state, and the newspapers by getting behind constructive and progressive movements are helping very materially to build it up."

Mr. Jones told of the successful culmination of a fight waged by his newspaper for the city management form of government in Waco.

"For three years we fought for i he said, "and it was finally carried. Th politicians got busy and put it up to t people for another vote, seeking to r vive the old form. On the first of t year, however, the motion of the r actionaries was defeated by an ov whelming majority, proving conclusiv the public power of our paper."

Mr. Jones will return to Waco in Ap upon the arrival of Mr. Marsh in N York.

Mr. Fentress and Mr. Marsh own newspapers in Texas. Last month th took over management of the Morni Telegraph, denying to EDITOR & PU LISHER that they had any financial terest in the property. E. R. Thomas, owner and publisher, is in ill health a at present is in Florida.

NEW SHADING MEDIUM ELIMINATES BEN DAY

Transparent Sheets Placed On Ad Copy or Photographs Make Ben Day Effects—Invented by Benjamin Hutchinson

A method, claimed to do away completely with smudgy advertising copy and considerable saving of time and expense

Stipple on Line Drawing

The Ben Day, this week reached a quantity production basis in New York where it is handled by Bourges Service, Inc. It is called the Hutchinson Artists Shading Medium, and was invented by Benjamin Hutchinson and originally handled from the Pacific Coast.

Briefly this medium consists of transparent "shading sheets" of special colored celluloid with photographically the characters of a "Ben Day" nature on them. These sheets are placed over the advertising copy or photograph to be treated or shaded before engraved. The opaque characters are quickly and easily removable from any portion desired by rubbing with a pointed stick or wood stub. Where left, the character of the shading sheet will combine photographically with the under-detail of the copy. No machine is required. The shading sheets may be obtained in 84 different patterns.

The process was originally made by hand. Now machine manufacture has been perfected and the plant has a capacity of 10,000 sheets a day. The sheets measure 9 x 12 inches. Bourges Service, of which Albert R. Bourges is president, is sole manufacturer and distributor.

"This is not a transfer method, but shading sheets that you can put on your copy and see the complete effect before making a plate," Mr. Bourges explained. "The copy is in no way affected when the sheet is removed. Color or tint effects may be obtained free from all detail of the copy by photographing separately."

Mr. Bourges is a veteran engraver, and a member of the photo-engraver's union. For 12 years he conducted his own office as consulting photo-engraver.

CHICAGO HONORS EUGENE FIELD

Ceremonies Mark Removal of Poet's Ashes To New Shrine

The ashes of Eugene Field, the "poet of happy childhood," were reinterred with simple ceremonies Sunday in the churchyard of the Church of the Holy Comforter, at Kenilworth, Ill.

More than 1,000 religious dignitaries, newspaper men, authors, poets, civic leaders and children stood in the churchyard in a swirling snow storm while the casket was lowered to its final resting place.

Judge Jesse Holdom, an intimate of Field's, delivered the principal address in which he declared Field the "most charitable and lovable character" he had ever known.

In conclusion, Judge Holdom read "Little Boy Blue," that begins "The little toy dog is covered with dust," one of the best known of Field's poems.

Among the honorary pall bearers were Mayor William E. Dever; President Walter Dill Scott of Northwestern university; President Max Mason of the University of Chicago; James Stephens, Irish author; Judge Charles G. Allen of St. Louis; Charles H. Dennis, editor of the Chicago Daily News and author of "Eugene Field's Creative Years"; Henry B. Fuller, Clarence A. Hough and Walter M. Hill, authors; Mayor Charles H. Bartlett of Evanston; Congressman Henry R. Rathbone; and W. C. Dunlap, former mayor of Cleveland Heights, O.

When Field died in 1895, he was conducting the "Sharps and Flats" column of the Chicago Daily News. He had formerly done newspaper work in St. Louis, Kansas City and other mid-western cities.

BRITISH AD MAN HERE TO SELL CEYLON

Douglas E. Shaw Representing 3 Ceylon Papers Tells of Rubber Boom Prosperity—Formerly Commercial Editor

Douglas E. Shaw, general manager of the London office of the Ceylon Observer, the Ceylon Daily News, and The Dinamina, is in New York on behalf of the group of newspapers he represents, and to outline the American sales opportunities of Ceylon, now rapidly becoming Westernized. He arrived in New York by the Berengaria on March 2, and will remain in the United States until the end of this month.

Douglas E. Shaw

"My object in visiting the United States," said Mr. Shaw, "is to urge American advertisers to take advantage of the opportunities presented by the remarkable economic progress of Ceylon. As a result of this progress, which has been accelerated by the present boom in the tea and rubber industries, Ceylon now takes a prominent position among the markets of the Orient. She is less overshadowed by her great neighbor, India, and exporters on both sides of the Atlantic are taking an increasing interest in this prosperous island. Its total trade with the United States approximates $34,000,000.

"The Ceylonese public includes a community of extremely wealthy people, as well as a vast body of peasant farmers whose comparatively high purchasing power constitutes a most important factor in trade. The population of the island is roughly 5,000,000. The standard of life of the educated classes is high, and embraces all the features of modern civilization. Manufactured goods and luxuries of all kinds find a demand not only from the 10,000 European residents but from the much larger public of prosperous Ceylonese. American cars and trucks are being imported at an average rate of 40 per week."

Mr. Shaw spent more than five years in Ceylon, starting as a tea planter. He was then engaged by one of the leading merchant houses of Colombo, thereby gaining an experience of trade and agriculture which enabled him to take the position of commercial editor of the Ceylon Observer. Three years ago he was sent to reorganize the London office, which has developed considerably owing to the amalgamation of the Observer with the Daily News and the Dinamina to form a publishing house on the most up-to-date lines. His office is located at 180 Fleet street.

MARQUETTE "U" SEEKS TO ENCOURAGE INITIATIVE AMONG ITS STUDENTS

Freshmen Spend Considerable Time in Laboratory to Test Fitness for Newspaper Work—Practical Experience Offered on Milwaukee Dailies

By J. L. O'SULLIVAN

Director, College of Journalism, Marquette University

COURSES in the College of Journalism at Marquette University are designed to give students a knowledge of background and cultural subjects; to show them how this knowledge may be applied to practical journalistic work and to teach them the fundamentals of writing, editing and newspaper management. Full development of individuality and initiative is encouraged and fostered.

J. L. O'SULLIVAN

Marquette seeks to give the student a broad knowledge of History, Economics, Sociology, a foreign language, as well as of English and professional Journalism subjects.

Taming the freshmen presents the most difficult problem.

The first year, no instruction in professional journalism subjects is given. However, the freshman English course is designed to teach a clear, forceful and entertaining style, by a close study of words, sentence structure, paragraph topics and extended composition, with rules for emphasis, coherence and unity as applied to newspaper requirements. It is the aim to train the freshman in accurate observation, pithy and graphic expression. The freshman also makes a study of the leading newspapers of the country for the purpose of gaining an idea of their characteristics.

Considerable time is spent by the freshman in the "laboratory," fitted up as an editorial room, so that he may gain an idea of the way such an office is conducted. Here he learns typewriting and terms in general use in journalism from contact with upper classmen.

The remainder of the freshman course is made up of history, a foreign language, public speaking and an elective of a science, economics or some other such branch that will fit into his future course of study.

Such a curriculum permits the student to have sufficient knowledge of journalism to determine whether or not he desires to follow his studies; enables the faculty to decide whether the student has the necessary qualifications and finally gives a knowledge of subjects which may be applied to work in later years.

Fundamentals of news writing and reporting are taught during the sophomore year, coupled with a continuation of history, English, foreign language and of the science, economics or whatever the student may have started the first year.

The theory is given in lectures and discussions in the class room; the practical in assignments given for work on the student paper and on the Milwaukee papers. In the editorial room of the Marquette Tribune, the upper classmen are the editors and hold the executive positions while the reporting is done by the sophomores. During the sophomore year, the students also cover news for the Milwaukee papers, taking their assignments direct from the editors and reporting back to them. All of the work for the Marquette Tribune as well as the other student publications while done under close faculty supervision is under the control of students of the College of Journalism.

Following the course in reporting and news writing, copy reading is taken up. Along with the work in the class room, the students work on the copy desk of the publications, read proof and perform other such duties under actual publishing conditions. The other professional subjects are taught during the junior and senior years. The junior studies history of journalism for a semester, followed by journalism ethics. He also takes mechanical journalism for one semester. The Marquette College of Journalism has a printing equipment work $50,000 which is at the disposal of the students. All of the University printing, including publications and catalogues, is done by the Marquette Press. Students during the semester of mechanical journalism, spend considerable time in the printing shop to learn under actual working conditions, type, make-up and the mechanical side of the work. A course in newspaper management, where the class room lectures and discussions are supplemented by actual management experience on the college publications, is also given during the junior year. The junior continues his foreign language, history, English and in addition takes logic and psychology.

During the senior year, editorial writing is required for one semester. The only other required journalism study during the senior year is a course "Editorial Co-ordination" in which the student makes a study of the history and recent developments and tendencies of law, medicine, dentistry, engineering, nursing, and other professions, taught on the campus, so that he may be able to at least know some of the authorities, traditions and hopes of the other callings.

The senior has usually made up his mind about what he will do after he leaves the University, and he may choose from courses in advertising, the country newspaper, critical writing, feature writing, trade journalism, publicity and news agencies during his final year.

Along with each of these courses, students do practical work. They edit community newspapers, giving the editor a vacation and there has never been a case where Marquette sent students out to edit a county paper that the editor didn't admit that they put out a better paper than he did. They write stories for the United Press and the Associated Press. They work for several of the many trade journals in Milwaukee, some making an average of $25 a week from articles turned in to these publications, while they are attending school. Feature stories throughout the city are covered and written for publications. Some are printed, and some are not, but the students get the experience, if not the checks. The senior also studies general ethics and continues his foreign language and English.

During the entire four years of study, the students attend weekly meetings of the Marquette Press Club. All students of journalism are members. These meetings, presided over and conducted by the students, with faculty members present, are designed to allow an opportunity for free discussion of various phases of journalism which might not be touched upon in class work. Problems, and tendencies are taken up and the discussion is guided to build ever higher ideals in the minds of the future journalists. Usually some executive or other worker from a Milwaukee newspaper or other publication is present at these meetings to present ideas on the subject under discussion from the most practical point of view.

With such a course, Marquette has found through 16 years' experience in journalism instruction that the average student is able to go out into the world and reflect credit upon himself and his Alma Mater.

J. L. O'Sullivan, author of this article, 11th in a series interpreting the work of journalism schools to editors of the nation, is himself a Marquette alumnus, being graduated with the first journalism class in 1914. After a year with the Milwaukee Sentinel, he joined the United Press as Wisconsin manager. Later he was transferred to New York as manager of the U. P. local office. In 1920 *he was appointed manager of the U. P. O IDLENESS FOR "SPECIALS" COVERING LEAGUE OF NATIONS AT GENEVA

ust Keep in Close Touch With Politics of Virtually Every Country to Write Accurately—Good Facilities for Press

ENEVA, Feb. 23.—Special correspon- dent in Geneva is not a job of idle- s and pleasure by the great silvery e of Switzerland. On the contrary, it erhaps one of the most exacting jobs a special in the whole of Europe. importance of Geneva is hard to ge from afar, one has to go there to an idea of the varied nature of the ial's task.

nstead of following the politics of one ntry, the special at Geneva has to fol- the international politics of almost the countries of Europe. A dozen es a day he meets representatives of powers and small powers, and he has e more than ordinarily familiar with outstanding questions interesting the ntry of each. As soon as a big ques- comes up, it is not the argument of side which he has to follow and re-, but the arguments of both sides, to nothing about what the representa- s of neighboring States have to say he same question.

he desk of every special working in eva is daily piled with reports and rs from all parts of Europe, treaties, ngs of special commissions, statistics ade, information on boundaries, arbi- on arguments, as well as a mass of espondence from all sorts of sects and es. Everything has its importance, every paper has to be read through care.

is with a digest of all these docu- s in his head that the special begins laily task. At the League headquar- there is a very fine section set aside he press. In a large room a dozen ortably sized tables, not desks, are ved for members of the press, and regular correspondent has a large for his mail, big enough to take letters, which can be dropped into rough a wide slit at the top. This s a roomy locker, big enough for a vriter. The names of the journalists ese lockers are of men from all cor- of the earth, North and South Amer- Japan, and every part of Europe. n the writer visited the press sec- of the League all the lockers were e except No. 13. Are newspaper superstitious? By now even No. 13 have a tenant, for the newspaper are growing rapidly in numbers.

the press room there is a large no- board, and all announcements are on it before being given out. In vay every press man can know the latest by referring to the board. opposite the press room, across a corridor, is the telegraph office, and by are spacious telephone booths. oom being on the ground floor, ac- s easy.

y as is the press section now, it is to be busier still when Germany into the League. With the thor- ess which characterizes our former es, they mean to do the League for is worth. Already there are four nent German correspondents in Ge- devoting their attention to the labors e League, and when the entry of ny takes place this number will be sed probably to twelve or more.

From the history of American news- paper men who have been sent to Geneva to follow the League activities, one might almost make a forecast of the inevitable entry of America into the League.

Joseph E. Sharkey represents the As- sociated Press in Geneva and is a well- known figure.

Robert Neville is in Geneva for the New York Times, Albin Johnson for the New York World, E. Percy Noel for the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and Henry Wood for the United Press. It is un- derstood that they will shortly be joined by other permanent American correspon- dents, for it is becoming daily more and more realized that the League of Nations needs a special man's full time if it is to be properly covered.

Other countries have fully recognized the importance of the League as a news center. Buenos Aires La Nacion has sent Honorio Roigt there. La Nacion was the first Latin American newspaper to send a permanent correspondent to Geneva. Even a small country like Holland has two permanent correspondents, Czecho- slovakia one. Of course, when the League is in session all the big news in- terests send men specially to Geneva.

Increase of competition has come with increase of work, and news through dele- gates is much sought after. It is here that the permanent man has a great ad- vantage over specials sent to Geneva only during a session of the League. The per- manent man is known, and delegates know just what they can say to him, whereas with the strange correspondent they are often silent.

Space for newspaper men in the room where the Council of the League meets is already growing very limited, and their accommodation is one of the pressing problems. Each correspondent has his allotted seat.

Prints 176-Page Edition

The Colorado Springs (Col.) Gazette-Telegraph last Sunday issued its annual edition carrying 176 pages. The issue was claimed to be the largest ever pub- lished between the Pacific Coast and the Missouri river. More than 28 tons of newsprint were used. Preparation of the edition took nine weeks' time.

China Press Sued for $57,000

WEEKLY PAPERS MUST MODERNIZE TO LIVE

Encroachment of City Dailies Can Be Met with Enlivened News and Make-Up Bridgman Tells Wisconsin Press

A rapidly changing world, bringing the commercial disintegration of the rural town and, in consequence, an extension of the trade radii of the large cities far beyond their suburban limits, has made the metropolitan newspaper far more powerful and prosperous than it ever has been before.

JOHN A. KUYPERS

Such was the picture of the broadening market for the big city newspaper and the narrowing market for the country weekly painted by W. H. Bridgman, editor of the Stanley (Wis.) Republican, in an address at the recent annual convention in Milwaukee of the Wisconsin Press Association.

The convention, held for three days, closed with the re-election of the following officers: John A. Kuypers, editor, De Pere Journal Democrat, president; Merlin Hull, editor, Black River Falls Journal, vice-president, and Louis H. Zimmerman, editor, Burlington Standard Democrat, secretary-treasurer.

The Spring Valley Sun, with Charles Lowater, editor, was awarded first prize in class 1 of the community service contest held in 1925 by the Association, to determine the weeklies which performed the outstanding service to their communities.

The Burlington Standard Democrat, of which Louis H. Zimmerman is editor, was awarded first prize in class 2 for "giving effective support to a variety of commendable objects." The Algoma Record Herald, Harry H. Haideman, editor, was awarded second prize.

For promoting effectively a single important project, honorable mention was given to the Waupaca County Post, D. F. Burnham, editor, and to the Waterloo Courier, J. Lewis White, editor.

To save the country weekly from the strong competition of the city daily, it must modernize both its makeup and enliven its news, declared Mr. Bridgman, at the meeting.

"My opinion is that we will sink or swim with the old home town and our chief concern at this time should be in getting her righted and sailing on an even keel," he added.

The editors were guests of the Milwaukee Journal and Milwaukee Sentinel during their stay here.

Blames Movies for Paper's Suspension

Roy Jarnigan, for the last year publisher of the Linn Grove (Ia.) Independent, which has been issued from the plant of the Peterson Patriot, last week discontinued the Independent. In announcing the suspension he said that the people of the community were evidently more interested in movies than in a newspaper and had failed to support his venture.

PRAISES "YELLOW PRESS"

British Student Says It Is More Human Than Class Press of Britain

"The legitimate type of 'yellow press' had done more to crystallize the imagination of the American people and to lead the foreigner to an interest and early understanding of America than has probably any other agency."

That is the conclusion of John Greierson, of the University of Glasgow, who has spent a year in the United States in a study of newspapers, and who is now at the University of Wisconsin under a social science research fellowship.

Mr. Greierson has made an intensive analysis of the methods used by American newspapers to appeal to readers' interests. Comparing the so-called "yellow press" with the class press of England, Mr. Greierson finds the former far more attractive and more in accord with the wants of its readers.

"The biggest mistake of the British press is its failure to recognize the value of comics and sports news and of what the American press calls the 'human interest' story," declared Mr. Greierson.

"The yellow press is much more human than the conservative. Papers here appeal largely to a public trained in the vaudeville and the movies, and under such conditions there is no place for editorial prudishness and false modesty."

Anderson Named S. F. Chronicle M. E.

Karl Anderson, for many years political editor of the San Francisco Chronicle and then assistant managing editor, has been given the full title of managing editor.

The "A-Gram" idea (described below) as used by one newspaper

An idea to induce regular advertisers to use more space, which means more revenue that would be steady and also one which means no more than the first call to put it over, is the use of the words "A-GRAM" attached to the firm's name, for instance, Thorn-A-Gram. The ad is laid out as though it was another paper within the daily issue, and the firm's name appearing as the publisher. It could also be made for a full page ad from non-advertisers published weekly under the heading "Blankvilla AGram."—G. S. P.

Not every town can have an automobile show this spring, but any newspaper can hold one in its columns. Furthermore, it can give such a special section real value to its advertisers by making it different from the all too common hodge-podge of advertisements and "write-ups." The method is simple: Run advertisements as usual, but replace the cut and dried manufacturers' "publicity" by well written detailed descriptions of the various cars, accompanied, where possible, by illustrations. The technical data for the descriptions can be obtained from the specifications that are a part of every car catalogue and local dealers usually can supply the illustrations. In addition, run very brief biographical sketches of the dealers, accompanied by photographs of the men and of their places of business. With a few attractive heads and embellishments, obtainable from any good advertising cut service, and some live miscellaneous stuff pertaining to automobiles, a readable section—and one that will be read—can be gotten together with little more effort than is often expended on the stereotyped "automobile section." —T. A. H.

A large cake making concern of Boston had a full page ad running in the Boston papers for several days. The center of the page was devoted entirely to the concern itself, its products, etc. In boxes surrounding the story were advertisements of the companies which supplied them with flour, extracts, machinery, trucks, etc. C. E. Pellissier, Boston, Mass.

V. V. McNitt Says Modern Journalism Better Than That of Greeley's Day

Modern journalism, characterized by many critics as "commercialized," is a vast improvement over the old political journalism of 50 years ago, V. V. McNitt, editor of McNaught's Monthly, and president of McNaught's Syndicate, told students of the department of journalism of the University of Michigan last week.

McNitt was in Ann Arbor as one of the speakers at the fifth annual convention of the Michigan Interscholastic Press Association, for which more than 250 high school editors of the state assembled.

"The advertising influence we hear so much about," he asserted, "is much less real and certainly far less pernicious, than the literal subsidizing of newspapers by political parties that took place in the days of Horace Greeley."

The convention was conducted under the combined auspices of the journalism department of the University of Michigan and the Michigan chapter of Sigma Delta Chi, national professional journalism fraternity.

Lee A. White, of the Detroit News was another newspaper speaker.

City editors of small dailies or weeklies in communities where meetings are so few and far between as to make the keeping of an assignment book a discouraging proposition may find the use of a large calendar pad more satisfactory. When, for days at a time, the assignment book shows nothing, the negligent editor-reporter may fail to look at it and thus miss the occasional item he has jotted down for a far future date. The calendar that is torn off, day by day, will remedy this possibility.—E. D. S., Albuquerque, N. M.

Added Purchasing Power in New York State Creates a Substantial Market

Experts of the New York State Motor Vehicle Bureau estimate that the number of cars registered by next Summer will have reached 1,900,000, an increase of 250,000 over last year's total. They also report that new cars in the neighboring States, which contribute heavily to the Summer tourist traffic in New York will approximate 300,000.

In 1925 the registration in this State was approximately 14 per cent greater than in 1924, and statisticians are led to believe that if the present rate of increase is maintained New York in seven or eight years will have twice the number of cars it now boasts.

This indication of extraordinary motor travel presents a purchasing power that makes a substantial addition to the indicated local wealth in any given section of the Empire State.

New York is the Mecca of countless thousands of motoring tourists—it is likewise the Mecca of local dealers.

Sunday Dinner Talk

WHEN you check over the exclusive stories in your Sunday newspaper, has this thought ever occurred to you:

"It isn't the number of words that pour over my copy desk on Saturday night that count. It is the number of big outstanding stories that make dinner-table conversation on Sunday."

The exclusive dispatch that tells the story from a fresh angle, with a personal touch, is the story that makes the best "mouth-to-ear" advertising.

Every Sunday dispatch of the Consolidated Press is a "talk-about" story. Each story presents a new angle of a topic that is "in the news" or presents its latest interpretive development.

You will find these distinctive dispatches in the one dominant newspaper in papers of metropolitan size down to those of 10,000 or less in circulation because it isn't the number of words that pour over the copy desk that counts, but the number of stories that reach the reader and become a part of his daily conversation.

Our Friday Night Leased Wire Service for Sunday morning papers presents the news behind the news in its most attractive form;—the "talk-about" story.

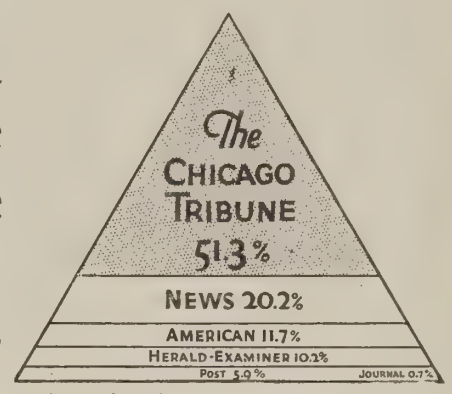
The charts below represent three graphic reasons why publishers seeking to increase their National Advertising revenues should use The Chicago Tribune.

In the territory covered by The Tribune (Zone 7) are to be found 28% of advertisers doing a national business.

22% of the total number of advertising agencies are to be found in The Chicago Territory.



During 1924 28% of the money spent by National Advertisers in 29 leading magazines came from advertisers located in The Chicago Territory.

Not only in Chicago but in more than 1,000 other communities throughout Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin, The Chicago Tribune is read every morning by an overwhelming majority of the manufacturers, bankers, lawyers, executives and business men generally.

How publishers bought space in Chicago newspapers during 1925

IT is to be expected that a manufacturer knows the most about the product he sells. Publishers are credited with exercising judgment when choosing mediums in which to advertise their own publications.

Proportion of space used by publishers in Chicago newspapers during 1925

In 1925, the overwhelming choice of publishers was The Chicago Tribune.

39 publishers used a total of 1,442,840 agate lines of advertising space in Chicago newspapers in 1925. Over half, 741,011 lines, were placed in The Tribune. 18 of the 39 used more space in The Tribune than in all the other Chicago newspapers combined.

This extraordinary tribute to the worth of Tribune space comes from a class of space buyers unusually well qualified to judge media.

The First Woman Unveiled in Turkey

Halidé Edib Hanum, who led the way for freeing her sex from polygamy, has written the story of her life. It marks the climax of a struggle against the tyrannies of a thousand years.

For sheer drama the narrative surpasses any biography of recent times

By arrangement with the Century Company we offer the unique memoirs as a newspaper serial before book publication.

No tale of the Arabian Nights is more fascinating than this first revelation by the beautiful woman who left a harem to attend college, fought as a soldier in the Turkish Army, and held a portfolio in the first revolutionary cabinet after Sultans ceased to rule the Ottoman Empire.

The series of more than 60,000 words will be released April 25, to continue Sunday and daily for four weeks; or it may be used in weekly chapters for a period of several months

No reader can fail to be thrilled by Halidé Edib Hanum's disclosures of the harem and her tragic adventures on the way to freedom from polygamy

The Judgment of Experts

In 1925, the great newspapers of the United States did more advertising in the Herald Tribune than in any other New York newspaper

STUDY the chart above. It is based on figures compiled by the statistical department of the New York Evening Post.

It proves that in the minds of those best fitted to judge the worth of a newspaper and its circulation, the New York Herald Tribune has attained a dominant position and is the logical keystone for any campaign aimed to reach the influential people of New York, the World's Greatest Market.

Furthermore in all classifications in 1925 the Herald Tribune gained a total of 3,218,864 lines — or 923,636 lines more than the combined gain of the Times, American and World.

The New York Herald Tribune has no "trade" deals.

Fine New Newspaper Plants Inadequate Under Stress Of Rapid Delivery

Chicago Tribune Announces $1,000,000 Addition to New Tower—Other Plants Outgrown in Amazingly Short Time—Speedy Service to Readers Underlying Cause

THE Chicago Tribune has announced plans for a newspaper plant to be erected north of Tribune Tower at Michigan boulevard and Tribune square.

"The building now in immediate contemplation," says the Tribune, "will mark the first step in a series of construction operations which when completed will cover Tribune Square with a great newspaper plant and office building 220 x 300 feet, the whole blending architecturally with the beauty of the mother structure, the tower."

The building to be constructed as soon as wreckers have finished tearing down the old garage building will cost $1,000,000, and will consist of three basements and a pressroom floor, the temporary roof to be level with the upper Michigan avenue driveway. It will be 118 by 132 feet. Foundations will go to bedrock, being planned to support the future structure.

Twenty new press units have been planned for the new building, making eighty in all. This will give a capacity of 1,000,000 Tribunes daily, as compared, according to the Tribune, with "the practical limit capacity at present of 730,000 daily copies."

The Sunday Tribune, it was said, will be increased from present capacity of 1,250,000 to 1,400,000.

Plans have been perfected for 170 press units when the building program is complete. This will give a daily capacity of 1,600,000 daily and 2,200,000 Sunday.

Newspaper owners throughout the country are facing the same situation that has compelled the Chicago Tribune to proceed with the erection of a $1,000,000 addition to its plant which five years ago was considered adequate for the expansion of at least a decade. In cities of 50,000 population as well as those centres of a million or more people, the demands of advertisers for large space and the necessity of giving complete and unbelievably speedy service to readers have placed unendurable burdens upon plants hailed as magnificent a few months or years before.

One can recall, without much effort, a number of newspaper homes looked upon as "permanent" for the next generation when they were erected, yet entirely inadequate to the publisher's needs within the brief span of five years. The Detroit News plant 10 years ago was considered the zenith of newspaper planning, architecturally and from the standpoint of operations. It has been outgrown several times by the lusty strides of the News. The New York Herald Tribune, Cleveland Plain Dealer, the Cleveland News, the Des Moines Register-Tribune, the Buffalo News—all of these and a host of others are occupying new buildings or adding adjacent space to the hard-pressed existing plants at the present time.

Of course, no newspaper publisher or any other business man planning for the future in 1916 could have foreseen the activity of the past seven years. The poorest of these post-armistice years passed far beyond any predictions that might have been made for it a decade ago. Circulations have increased tremendously since the war whetted public interest in news columns. Advertising now presses the columns of many newspapers beyond the limits of safety. Delivery facilities which laid the evening paper on the subscriber's porch before the evening meal ten, or even five years ago, are not able to meet the exigencies of the present. The morning paper which presents the complete story of last night's hockey match or prize fight or the play-review, to the reader in a thirty-mile distant suburb has the call over the competitor with only a bulletin.

All of these demands on the newspaper plant have been intensified and again intensified in recent years. Twenty years ago, the movie played a small part in the entertainment of the public. Today it takes one night a week at least from the stay-at-home periods of many families. The automobile was an attribute only of the wealthy 15 years ago; today it is as integral a part of the home equipment as the kitchen table. It calls for its share of the day's leisure period. Five years ago, the radio was unknown except to a few; today the rider on a New York or Chicago elevated railroad sees far more aerials than he does chimneys.

The newspaper editor of 1926, facing this competition against his highly perishable product—news—is organized to meet it and overcome it. His telegraph news is received by machines. A certain quota of his space is apportioned to features which require little rehandling in the office. Additional composing room equipment enables him to put out more editions and to put them out earlier—and additional composing room equipment requires additional floor space.

Sharing the new composing room machinery with the editor, in fact getting more time and attention than the editor gets, is the overwhelming volume of local advertising, all of which is original composition. The composing rooms are taxed to the limit in time and space, and an added handicap which did not exist in 1916 is the definitely limited period of labor by mechanical employes. So many hours must be worked per day, now as then, but now these hours must be worked between certain stated points on the clock.

Great as this pressure is in the upstairs departments, it is multiplied many times when the pressroom and delivery staffs go into action. Many metropolitan publishers, having in mind one or more of the conditions mentioned above, demand of their forces that the paper be delivered to the last subscriber an hour after it comes from the folder.

Press room units have been multiplied, doubled, tripled, and quadrupled in some offices to shorten the gap between the editorial deadline and the delivery of the paper to the suburban home. Truck fleets have been assigned by some papers to the task of making delivery to the subscriber's doorstep. Postal service cost has become prohibitively high, according to some publishers, and for many it is far too slow for modern conditions.

Presses need floor-space near the ground. Delivery departments and truck areas must facilitate a fast start. They cannot be located on a spare floor ten stories from the ground.

Thus publishers who thought their floor space of 1920 afforded plenty of room for expansion now find themselves with space to spare, but not where it is most urgently needed. Offices with 50 per cent more advertising linage and 30 per cent more circulation than when the plant was constructed may find that they can handle the additional job with a 10 per cent increase in editorial working space, 20 per cent more composing room facilities and additional stereotpying equipment that can be housed without inconvenience. The shoe pinches hard, as a rule, when it comes to doubling press equipment or providing loading accommodations for several additional motor trucks.

This question of new plants and additional facilities is probably receiving more attention from publishers now than any other aspect of their business. Not so long ago pride of achievement, desire to erect a monument to their business ability, a secondary desire to profit a little by shrewd buying of real estate.

Model of Chicago Tribune Tower as it will appear with million dollar addition.

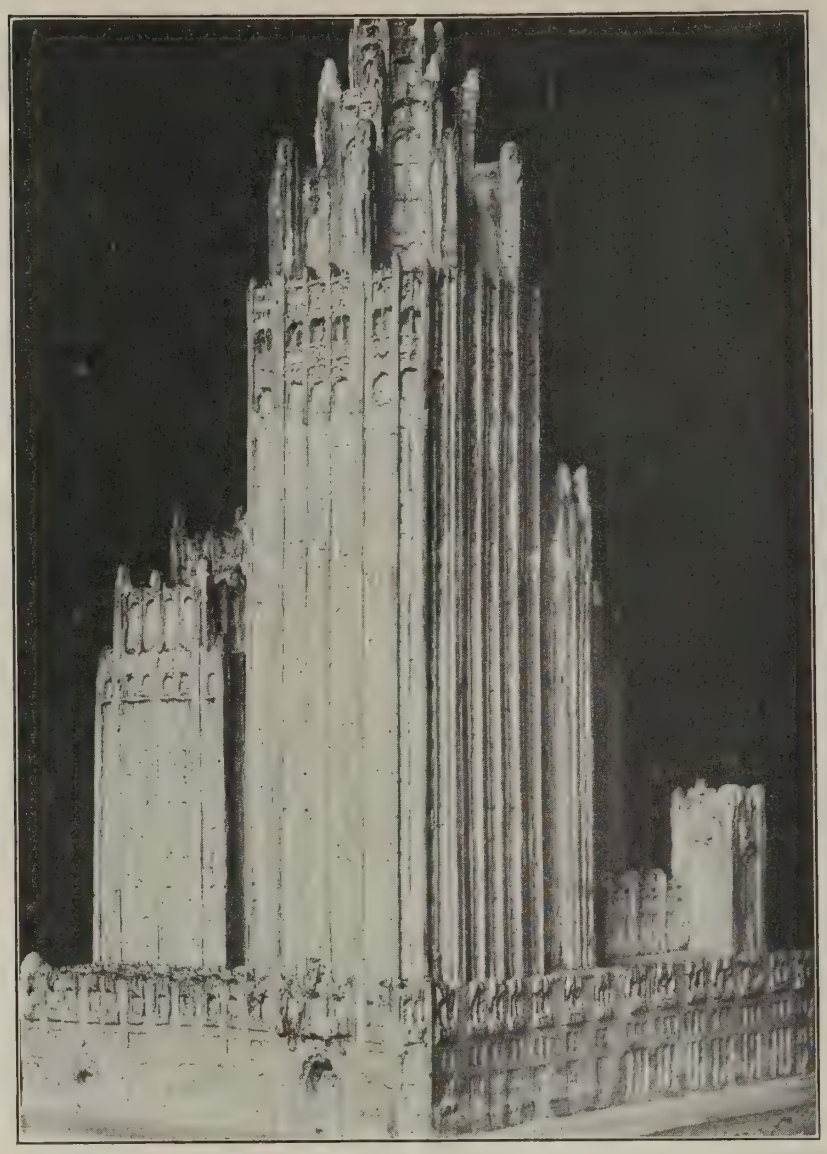
or a wish to put it over on the "other fellow" in magnificence and amplitude of equipment often worked confusion in the building plans of publishers. It was often forgotten that the making of a newspaper is a manufacturing enterprise and that convenience of handling raw materials and of getting the finished product into the hands of the consumer as quickly as possible were primary considerations.

That, unfortunately, is still true in many citable cases, but more and more publishers are coming to look upon their operations in their genuine aspects and to submerge the wish for personal glorification through architecture. That is not to be taken to mean that the ideal newspaper plant should be a barn or a bare shoe-box structure of brick, concrete, and steel. It does mean, however, that beauty of structure is to be considered after the manufacturing needs have been served. That these ends can be co-ordinated is witnessed by a number of buildings erected in recent years.

With speed of production and speed of distribution as the prime requisites of modern publishing, newspaper publishers are studying plant sites in their cities to find a location which will supply these needs at the smallest capital charge. Favorite sites are those convenient to railroad rights-of-way, where a siding exists or can be obtained without too much difficulty. The basic raw product of the newspaper operation is newsprint paper, costing 30 per cent of the publisher's budget, bulky and costly to handle and subject to damage if tossed about between freight car and pressroom. A railroad siding in or adjacent to the plant eliminates this source of waste and also cuts handling charges to a minimum. Also to be considered is the fact that property near a railroad line is ordinarily not in the high-priced zone of any city, even though it be not far distant from the business centre.

Another factor considered in locating the plant is the history of the city's growth and the direction it has taken. This information is not always easy to obtain, but it is ascertainable and usually definite. The best practice today locates the plant not in or at, but just out of the busy commercial district, at a point which should be reached by expanding business within six to 10 years.

Convenient routes between the plant and the post office or railroad stations are also of first importance in locating the building, both for morning and for evening newspapers. The latter especially are now taking note of the volume and direction of flow of traffic between their delivery doors and the focal points of distribution. Sometimes removal to a site across the street or around the corner has saved several minutes per truck delivery and thereby several thousand dollars annually by sending trucks directly to their destination rather than by circuitous routes or against the body of heavy traffic.



No newspaper editor or circulation man needs to think for more than a second about the value to his work of an additional 10 or 20 minutes leeway on each edition. To both it means a better, a more salable product, and while circulation produces no direct profit to the newspaper, the prestige that follows getting the news out first and getting it completely, should soon be reflected in the advertising columns.

The desired leeway exists, but it is seldom available for the editor or the distributor. It exists in the form of minutes wasted in back-tracking work over areas already traversed, turning unnecessary corners and making needless flights through conveyors. Publishers appreciate this, as has been noted in the many news stories of new newspaper plants that have appeared in EDITOR & PUBLISHER in recent months. "Straight-line production" is a phrase that appears in most plant descriptions now, and it is a fact that most newspaper publishers who have sought this end have achieved it to a remarkable degree. Plant sites have been selected with this in mind, as well as convenient receipt of raw material and dispatch of finished product.

Architects have informed publishers that a room with a 12 foot ceiling can be lighted to a maximum depth of 45 feet from windows on one side. With opposite walls fronting on two open streets, the room can be lighted to the extent of 90 feet. But a building erected on a plot 150 by 150 feet requires a light-well for proper illumination and the location of the light-well must be carefully considered with reference to minimum interference with the straight movement of the manufacturing processes. A light-well cannot be overlooked even when adjoining property now vacant permits direct illumination. Adjacent property in a location judiciously selected by the publisher will probably not remain vacant during the entire term of the newspaper plant's usefulness. Provision must be made, therefore, for removal of some floor space to build a light-well if the owner next door decides to build.

Provision is also being made in most modern buildings for future expansion by utilization of space already part of

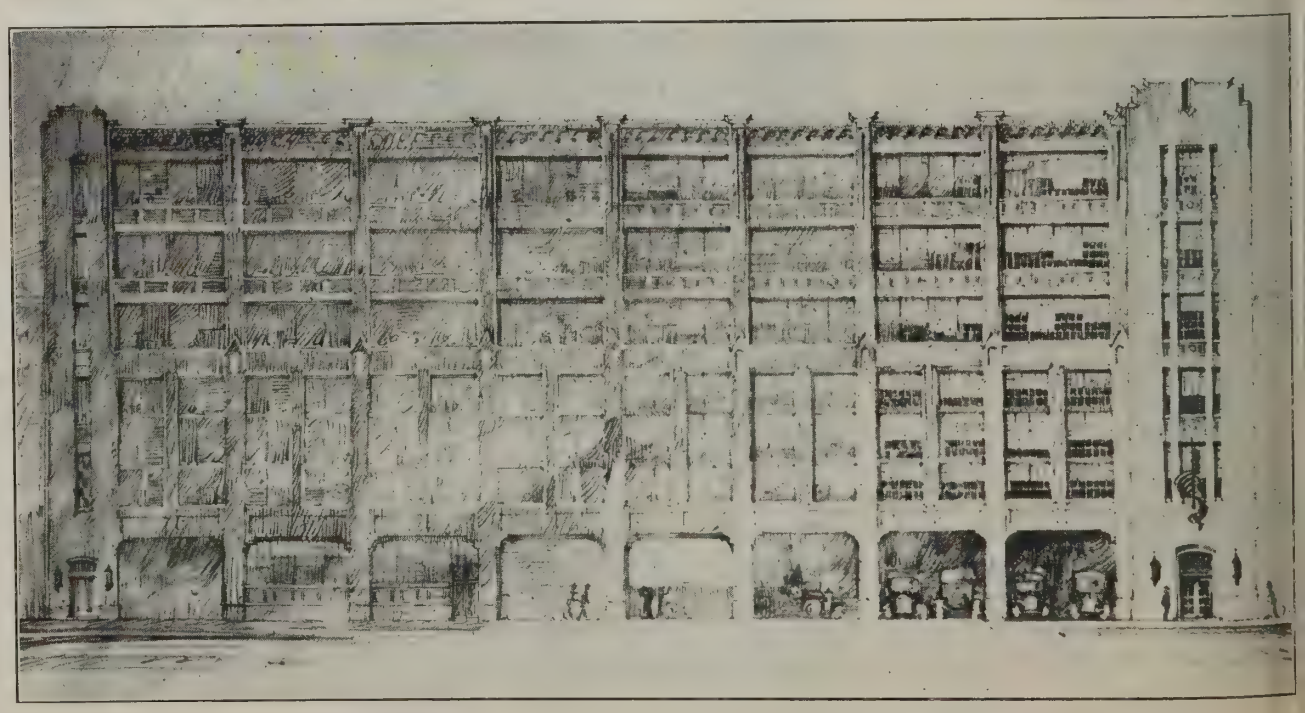
N. Y. DAILY NEWS PLANS BROOKLYN PLANT

Will Handle Stereotyping, Printing and Delivery of Borough Edition—Other Auxiliary Plants Planned

Construction will start in a few days on a Brooklyn building for the New York Daily News, the first of several auxiliary printing plants from which the tabloid paper's great circulation can be economically and quickly distributed. The plot is 110 feet deep, has 293 feet frontage on Pacific street, between Carlton and 6th aves., and contains 32,230 square feet. The plant will be of sufficient capacity to print the Brooklyn circulation of the News, with ample space for expansion, according to J. W. Barnhart, business manager.

The large circulation of the News has presented a big production problem to its publishers, which has been solved in a manner somewhat different from conventional newspaper practice. The usual policy is to house all activities so far as possible in one central plant, but in the case of the News the production is so great that this solution is not practicable. The editorial departments, general offices, and those mechanical departments such as photo-engraving, type-setting, etc., whose finished product is the newspaper page, will continue to be housed centrally.



In this plant molds will be made of each page, and these molds will be dispatched to auxiliary printing plants, where stereotype plates will be cast and the papers printed. These auxiliary plants will be placed in carefully chosen localities, with a view to reducing the time required to deliver the printed papers to the newsdealers.

The News building in Brooklyn was designed by Lockwood, Greene & Co., Inc., who also designed the plant of the New York Herald Tribune. The initial installation in the press room will consist of 25 8-page Goss unit-type presses, with reels underneath, arranged in two rows—one of 15 and the other of 10.

The initial foundry installation will consist of 2 double Junior autoplates and 2 Autoshavers.

The mail room will be on the ground floor, on a level with the floor of the delivery trucks, to facilitate loading. Presses will be installed on the second floor, and the stereotyping foundry on the floor above the presses.

The upper floors will be used for paper storage. Space is reserved at one end of the basement and ground floor for a garage, to take care of the trucks used in Brooklyn.

JOURNALISM ENTERING NEW EPOCH OF SERVICE

Principles of Research and Education to Mark Future Press Progress, Walter Strong Tells Students—Says Profession Must Absorb Spirit of the Universities

A VISION of a new age for newspapers in which they will stand more eminently than ever before as educational and research institutions was presented by Walter A. Strong, publisher of the Chicago Daily News in an address to graduating students of Chicago University at the recent spring convocation.

Journalism even now is entering the new age of greater service to the public, and in its progress the profession must take on more and more the spirit of the university, he said, to seek with free mind and unquenchable zeal for the facts of life, to place in the hands of man that greatest equipment for his own control—knowledge of himself, his past and his inner nature.

In his talk, which was titled "Newspapers and the New Age" Mr. Strong said in part:

"If there is a higher education so there is also a higher journalism. Both are founded upon principles of enlightenment and leadership; both have an ethical mission in that high sense of a search for truth.

"It is important to remember that 75 per cent of the people who can read, read nothing but newspapers and the remaining 25 per cent devote to their newspapers a very little percentage of the time given to reading of any kind. With such figures in view one may better comprehend the great responsibility placed upon the press.

"It can create or destroy, almost at will, not merely individuals but institutions. The press can start wars—though it may find it more difficult to stop them. In every community the more powerful newspapers become pocket guides to the public conscience—friends of the people.

"With this potential power at hand what a solemn necessity there is that they be true friends.

"Having become a gigantic commercial institution, in which many millions are invested, and at the same time an influence in millions of lives, the American press is still in the throes of re-establishing itself in accord with new conditions. Operating in a new age, glistening with new methods of communication and characterized by salient social changes, puzzling even to sociologists, the newspapers are working toward some goal almost too dim to be discerned. Yet concerning such a goal one may indulge in a few speculations. It is difficult to define American newspapers or to generalize about them; difficult to state facts.

"A newspaper, after all, is like the nervous system, in which are registered the myriad contacts with life and human action. It is then as difficult to study the functions of a newspaper as to study the chemistry of thought processes.

"It may therefore be maintained that a fourth epoch is about to be entered upon, or may alreday have been, by the American press. The pioneering days ended years ago. The day of 'personal journalism' is passing. The period of acquiring great mechanical agencies, of establishing bases, will give way—or is already doing so—to a fourth great era, in which one may be optimistic enough to think that the newspapers will take their true place as a social, intellectual, educative force. Certainly, publications which have become so essential, and among some classes, so exclusively employed, for absorbing information, entertainment and even moral principles, must erect new structures of greater durability and value, upon the more temporary frameworks of the era of experiment.

"Having captured the public, the newspapers as a body must now recognize an immense responsibility to the captives. I trust it is not too fantastic to compare this responsibility to that of the invaders and conquerors of new continents. The captors owe to the captives an education at the very least.

Walter A. Strong

"Now many of the leading newspapers in this epoch of great circulation have already recognized such a responsibility. The best of them, I believe, divide their conception of duty toward the public into perhaps three points:

"(1) Information, (2) guidance, (3) entertainment.

"Information first and foremost. Despite the disproportion assigned by some kinds of papers to other departments, the high average of the American press stands fast upon principles of information, impartially and fully presented.

"Permit me to make at this point an unequivocal statement in defense of American journalism. I will not debate it. In my opinion it is not debatable.

"Having demonstrated the fact that personal journalism serving an ulterior motive cannot succeed in this new age and having established their independence on a sound commercial basis, the great majority of newspapers in the United States are serving the people conscientiously and uninfluenced and unafraid of the financial loss so often given by their critics as the reason for so-called subsidized editorial policies or news statements of facts with which the critic does not agree.

"I say it is a great tribute to the development of American journalism that we have more honest newspapers today by far than existed even 15 years ago. If you desire to compare this situation with 30 and 40 years ago you have only to refer to the files of the then current issues of great metropolitan dailies to be shocked into the realization that journalism today has a more creditable position among those influences that contribute to the advancement of culture and the public conscience.

"A newspaper may be wrong in its judgment but it must be sincere. The majority of American newspapers are sincere—far less cynical than their critics, although their opportunities for criticism are unlimited.

"I am not afraid, in this exposed position, to make this statement, by way of illustration, in answer to the criticism often advanced by many intelligent and good people—'Crime News—Why do the newspapers print the stuff?'

"A newspaper man, if he has a high conception of his duty to the public as a "searcher after the truth," must take the unalterable position that the fact of crime is a part of the phenomena of our human relations in the experimental laboratory of life, and in this laboratory there has resulted an ever increasing accumulation of higher standards.

"I need not develop further the information duty of a newspaper. It is the best understood principle in modern journalism and runs back to the inalienable rights established in the doctrine of free speech established in the constitution.

"Guidance second—I recently heard six presidents of universities speak at the same dinner and without exception give testimony to the partial if not total failure of the present university program in the modern education system.

"It was very entertaining—even amusing—but hopeful. The realization of the inadequacy of our medium or system is a good beginning. I presume, therefore, I should begin my attempt to analyze the guidance principles of a newspaper with a confession of inadequacy.

"At best newspapers are structures exhibiting all the failings of human nature. The intellectual public endows a newspaper with superhuman powers of influence. That class thinks of a newspaper in terms of its own likes and dislikes, not regarding the many varieties of opinion of taste, up or down the scale.

"But it is the duty of a newspaper to interpret, to clarify public events and lead the public conscience in terms that can be understood by the mass mind. A study of the departments of a newspaper such as those on health, schools, social movements, politics, religion, in a hundred better class American newspapers, would reveal an astounding amount of matter distinctly of educational guidance, rather than of news or entertainment value.

"Yet with all that even a moderate account may credit to newspapers in being educational mediums, there is opportunity to enter upon a new stage of service to society. It is in this that newspapers need to absorb something of what is called the university spirit. If I understand the university spirit of today it is to seek, with free mind and unquenchable zeal, for the facts of life; to place in the hands of mankind that greatest equipment for his own control; knowledge of himself, his past and his inner nature.

"In a sense, newspapers are already research institutions, working with as much zeal and honesty as the scientist, but under different conditions and confronted inevitably and constantly by 'deadlines.' It is a task whose very difficulty thrills some of us. We must approximate results comparable with those obtained by men of far greater leisure and freedom from interruption.

"I believe that there is growing among newspaper men of the more earnest nature a zeal to build upon the great achievement of the past, saner and more scientific journals in the new age. Whether or not this growing sincerity and sense of duty will result in modifying the frenzy which has sometimes attended the business of daily journalism, one cannot speculate. Perhaps the wheels cannot be turned back. Perhaps we cannot slow down. But at least so far as modern conditions admit, amid conditions of competition entirely normal in such an age as this, we may make a more determined effort to understand, and perhaps in some degree to adopt, the careful, methodical and sane custom and viewpoints of the scientists."

COOLIDGE TO GREET PAN-AMERICAN EDITORS AT WASHINGTON MEET

Month's Tour of Country to Follow Capital Conference April 7-13—Many Entertainments and Ceremonies Planned

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE will welcome the delegates to the first formal session of the Pan-American Congress of Journalists on April 8, which will be attended by publishers and editors from leading newspapers in every country in South and Central America, Mexico and the West Indies, many of whom already are on the way to Washington. It is expected to be one of the most important newspaper meetings ever held in the Western hemisphere and to have far-reaching influences in molding public opinion in Latin-American countries. Twenty American republics outside the United States will be represented. Acceptances have been received from 130 Latin-American journalists.

The Congress will be in session from April 7 to 13, and following it the journalists will be taken on a tour of the eastern and central sections of the United States, lasting a month. From Washington the party will swing into Virginia, visiting historic and other points of interest, thence go to Annapolis, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York, where they will remain three days and be entertained by the press associations and publishers of that city, as well as by the Pan-American Society and other organizations.

From New York the editors will be taken as guests of the automotive industry of the United States on a trip carrying them as far West as Chicago. The itinerary will include West Point, Schenectady, Utica, Syracuse, Rochester, Niagara Falls, Buffalo, Erie, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Akron and Pittsburgh.

A special committee appointed by the Pan American Union will go to New York City to greet the delegates arriving on incoming steamers. The United States Government has arranged to extend to them the freedom of customs, as "distinguished foreign visitors," the delegates including the directing heads of over 100 daily papers. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia will present them with a "golden key" carrying with it the freedom of the city. The Spanish word for welcome—"Bienvenida"—will be written in the sky from an airplane on the opening day of the Congress.

The national capital will be specially decorated for the occasion, the Government buildings, Pennsylvania Avenue from the White House to the Capitol, and many business houses flying the flags of the Latin-American republics. On April 7, the day of their arrival, they will visit the Capitol, meet Speaker Longworth and attend a session of the Senate. Thence they will proceed to the Government Printing Office—for a luncheon given by Public Printer Carter.

On their visit to the Library of Congress the delegates will be shown a special exhibit of early and important documents bearing on the relations between the United States and other American republics arranged by the Librarian, Herbert Putnam. Then will follow a visit to the Lincoln Memorial and the Potomac for an aerial exhibit during which the flags of 21 American republics will be dropped by 21 airplanes.

The preliminary session of the Congress will be held on the evening of April 7, in the Hall of the Americas of the Pan-American Union building, where all the business meetings of the assembly will take place. Addresses of welcome will be made by the chairman of the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union, Secretary of State Kellogg; and by the vice-chairman, Hon. Francisco Sanchez Latour, minister of Guatemala, with a response by one of the Latin-American delegates. The election of a permanent chairman of the Congress also will take place.

"The Press and International Relations" will be the subject of discussion at the first formal session. The topic will be treated from the standpoint of the press as a medium of fostering closer relations between the American republics, through the selection of news so as to give a clearer picture of the national life of the peoples of America, through increasing space devoted to economic and financial development, and to cultural and artistic progress on the American continent. A luncheon at the New Willard by the publishers of the Washington Star will follow.

At four o'clock in the afternoon the delegates will be guests of the National Press Club at the laying of the corner-stone of the eleven-story National Press Building, at the corner of Fourteenth and F Streets, one block from the United States Treasury. President Coolidge will participate in this ceremony. A formal greeting and entertainment in honor of the delegates by the National Press Club will follow in Keith's Theatre, and after this a reception and buffet supper in the Club's quarters will be held. The United States Marine Band will play during the corner-stone laying ceremonies, with the United States Army Band and orchestra furnishing the musical features at the entertainment and reception.

Other events arranged for the editors during their stay in Washington include a reception at the White House by the President and Mrs. Coolidge; a luncheon by Secretary Hoover at the bureau of standards, to be followed by a visit through the bureau where a special exhibit is to be staged for the benefit of the visitors; a visit to Arlington National Cemetery and the tomb of the unknown soldier; a cavalry drill at Fort Myer; a dinner by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States at the headquarters of the organization; a luncheon by the United Press Association; a trip to Mount Vernon; a reception and ball at the Mayflower by the Southern Society of Washington; a banquet at the New Willard by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; and a luncheon at the Mayflower by John L. Merrill, president of the All America Cables Company.

Vice-President Dawes will address the Congress at the morning session on the last day of the Congress. This will be followed by the planting of a tree in the gardens of the Pan-American Union to commemorate the inter-American gathering of journalists; and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon will give a luncheon in their honor. A reception at the Pan-American Union that evening by the Secretary of State and Mrs. Kellogg will bring the Congress formally to a close. The Latin-American delegates will then be taken on a trip around the country which will get them back to New York about May 10.

In addition to the topics already mentioned, other subjects which will be discussed at the First Pan-American Congress of Journalists will be the following:

Newspaper ethics: the influence of journalism on international relations and the internal affairs of nations, bearing in mind the necessity of reconciling the liberty of the press with the highest conception of the ethics of journalism;

Gathering and dissemination of news, including the cost of such service and the transmission of news by cable, by wireless and by mail; rates, limitations, facilities, etc., of these various methods;

Advertising: consideration and study of questions relating to newspaper advertising; and the distribution, interchange and influence of advertising on journalism;

Newspaper organization in its various angles; Schools of journalism: and Association of Journalists: the organization of a Pan-American Association of Journalists.

SECRETARY OF STATE NAMED A. P. SPEAKER

Hon. Frank Kellogg to Address Annual Luncheon in New York April 20—Jorge Mitre, Buenos Aires La Nacion, to Speak

Secretary of State Kellogg, will address the Associated Press luncheon this year on April 20, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, Kent Cooper, general manager, announced this week.

JORGE MITRE

The affair this year will stress Latin-American relations. A large delegation of Associated Press members in South and Central America have notified Frank B. Noyes, A. P. president, that they will attend the annual meeting.

An officer of the A. P. will open the dinner with a brief message of greeting to these members in Spanish, and a response will be made by Jorge Mitre, publisher of the Buenos Aires La Nacion.

Arrangements for the luncheon were made by Adolph S. Ochs, publisher of the New York Times, Melville Stone, A. P. secretary, and Mr. Noyes.

Mr. Mitre arrived in this country from Paris on March 26. He has just concluded an inspection tour of La Nacion's European offices. He has been director of La Nacion for more than 15 years.

NEW YORK READY FOR PAN-PRESS EDITORS

Tentative Entertainment Program Announced for Week April 19-24 by Merchants Association—To Inspect Newspaper Plants

The New York Merchants Association this week announced tentative plans for the entertainment of 71 editors and publishers from Central and South America, expected in New York the week of April 19-24, following the first Pan-American Press Conference in Washington, April 7-13.

The Commodore Hotel will be headquarters for the delegates, and on Monday, April 19, an informal reception and dinner will be held at that hotel.

At 10:30 on April 20 they will be received by Mayor Walker at the City Hall; at 11:30 inspect the broadcasting studio of the Radio Corporation of America; at noon visit the New York Stock Exchange; at 1 o'clock attend the annual luncheon of the Associated Press; and during the afternoon be taken on sightseeing trips about the city.

In the evening of April 20 the delegates will be honor guests at a banquet to be given by New York newspaper publishers at the Park Lane Hotel.

The following day, April 21, will begin with an inspection of the rotogravure plant of the New York Times, after which the visitors will be the luncheon guests of Adolph S. Ochs, publisher, in the Times Annex. At 3 o'clock they will attend a special session of the annual convention of the American Newspaper Publishers' Convention. In the evening, following a theater party, they will visit the plant of the New York Herald-Tribune.

The morning of April 22 will be left free. At luncheon they will be entertained by the Pan-American Society of New York at India House, and in the afternoon will be guests on a trip over New York harbor. The general reception committee will be hosts at a dinner that evening at the Biltmore Hotel.

The entire party will leave New York, Friday, by motor buses for Detroit, making several stops en route.

Lincoln Cromwell, first vice-president of the Merchants' Association, is chairman of the general reception committee.

KNOWLTON TO CINCINNATI

Miami Tribune M. E. Named to Succeed Wade Mountfortt

Vernon B. Knowlton, managing editor of the Miami (Fla.) Tribune for more than a year, has been named managing editor of the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune to succeed Capt. Wade H. Mountfortt, who recently announced his resignation. Knowlton will take up his new duties April 1.

Knowlton was born in England and served his newspaper apprenticeship in London. He worked on up-to-date New York papers before joining the Miami Tribune.

A farewell dinner was to be given Saturday night to Capt. Mountfortt and Nait Grute, retiring news editor of the Commercial Tribune, at the Hotel Gibson with Harry A. Kenny, business reporter, as chairman of the arrangement committee. Harry W. Brown, president, will serve as toastmaster, and the retiring editors will each be presented with a traveling bag.

Mountfortt and Grute will leave April 1 for New York.

New Texas Daily Planned

The Tyler (Tex.) American, weekly, will become a morning daily, April 1, according to announcement by the Cooper Printing Company, publishers of the American and the Lindale (Tex.) News. The owners and editor of the new daily are Tom P. Cooper and Ray B. Cooper of Lindale.

TO LAY CORNERSTONE OF NATIONAL PRESS BUILDING, APRIL 8

President Coolidge to Be Chief Speaker at Washington Ceremonies With Sweinhart in Charge of Program—Structure to Cost $9,000,000

WITH President Coolidge as chief spokesman, and in the presence of a notable gathering of leading newspapermen of both the North and South American nations, the cornerstone of the new National Press Building will be laid at four o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, April 8.

Henry L. Sweinhart, former president of the National Press Club, is chairman of the committee in charge of the elaborate program being arranged for the occasion. Mr. Sweinhart was one of a group of club members who engineered the successful drive for the new structure which, at a cost of $9,000,000, will arise at the southeast corner of Fourteenth and F streets, Northwest, as a monument to American journalism.

The program will be opened with a concert by the famous United States Marine Band. A Metropolitan Opera star, probably Miss Frances Peralta, will sing. Invocation will be by Bishop Shahan, rector of Catholic University.

Ulric Bell, president of the National Press Club, and Washington correspondent for the Louisville Courier-Journal, will be master of ceremonies. He will introduce the President and other speakers who are to include outstanding newspaper publishers and editors including those attending the Pan-American Congress of Journalists. John Hays Hammond, president of the National Press Club Building Corporation, and James William Bryan, who put over the plans for the new building, will occupy places of honor. Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, Episcopal Bishop of Washington, will pronounce benediction.

A short time before the corner-stone laying an impressive ceremony will be held in the present headquarters of the National Press Club, in the Albee Building, when a copper box will become the receptable of a number of articles commemorative of the occasion. The copper box will be sealed within the corner-stone.

Into the copper box will go issues of Washington newspapers of Sunday, April 4, the latest copy of the Congressional Record, a roster of the members of the National Press Club, a history of the first press club formed in Washington during Civil War days, a copy of the constitution and by-laws of the National Press Club, a photograph of the old Ebbitt House hotel, as it appeared on the site of the new club building in 1865, a photograph of old "newspaper row" which is swallowed up by the new building, a copy of the Congressional Directory especially bound by the Government Printing Office for the occasion, and a silver dollar of the current year.

It is an interesting fact that just 100 years before the date of the laying of the cornerstone, John Randolph of Roanoke, Va., and Henry Clay left the old Ebbitt House to take part in their famous duel, brought about as a result of a challenge on the part of Randolph because Clay denounced the Virginian and even went so far as to declare that his forebears took grave responsibility upon themselves for bringing into the world such a man. The crowning insult was when Clay compared Randolph to a dead mackerel, that "shone and stank." It was in this duel that Randolph, with Clay's ammunition exhausted, refused to kill Clay as he could have with ease, but wasted his shot and shook hands with the brilliant orator instead.

The sealing committee consists of Mr. Sweinhart, George H. Carter, Public Printer of the United States, Charles P. Keyser, Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, and Carl D. Ruth, Washington correspondent of the Cleveland News.

The cornerstone laying committee includes all living former presidents of the National Press Club—Arthur J. Dodge, Frederic J. Haskin, Oswald F. Schuette, Frank B. Lord, Theodore Tiller, Grafton S. Wilcox, Earl Godwin, Mark L. Goodwin, Avery C. Marks, Jr., Robert B. Armstrong, Carter Field, and Henry L. Sweinhart, the present Board of Governors of the club, including Ulric Bell, president of the club, A. H. Kirchhofer, W. H. Atkins, Edgar Markham, Raymond Clapper, George F. Authier, George E. Durno, Emmet Dougherty, Franklin L. Fisher, Dan E. O'Connell, and Francis Stephenson; in addition the committee includes Kirke L. Simpson, Charles Michelson, John D. Erwin, Theodore Joslin, Walker Buel, Arthur S. Henning, Paul Wooton, Charles P. Keyser, Leo J. McClatchy, M. H. McIntyre, Ashmun N. Brown, Leo R. Sack, Carl Ruth, John C. Atchison, James P. Hornaday, Lewis Wood, Frederic William Wile, and H. O. Bishop, all Washington newspapermen; Felix Mahony, a Washington artist, Gene Buck, the composer, Harvey D. Jacob, general counsel of the building corporation, James D. Preston and William J. Donaldson, superintendents of the press galleries at the Capitol, James William Bryan, general manager of the National Press Building Corporation and the man responsible for the whole idea now being carried out, Frank B. Noyes, president of the Associated Press, Edward B. McLean, owner and editor of the Washington Post, G. Logan Payne, advertising and newspaper man, Franklin Adams, Counsellor of the Pan-American Union, George H. Carter, Public Printer, John Hays Hammond, John Joy Edson, Washington capitalist and treasurer of the National Press Building Corporation, and Jack S. Connelly, Washington representative of the Moving Picture Producers and Distributors of America.

Buyer of 3 Texarkana Papers Leaves Morning Paper in Field

D. W. Stevick, who recently purchased the three newspapers in Texarkana, Ark.—the Daily Texarkanian, Texarkana Journal and the morning Four States Press—has suspended both of the evening papers and changed the name of the Four States Press to the Texarkana Gazette.

Mr. Stevick stated that for the present he and his organization, a portion of which he brought from his Champaign (Ill.) News-Gazette, will concentrate on the morning paper, and that later when the city grows he will resume publication of an evening paper.

5,000 Visit Remodelled Plant

More than 5,000 Dane county, Wis., men and women visited the plant of the Madison (Wis.) State Journal on the occasion of the formal opening Saturday March 20, of its new addition and remodeled building. A 64-page edition was published.

Hines Named General Manager

Will M. Hines, managing editor of the San Francisco Bulletin, has been named general manager by Charles S. Stanton, publisher. He will continue to act as managing editor.

Parade Opens Used Car Sales

The Los Angeles (Cal.) Examiner recently opened its semi-annual used car sale with a huge parade in which more than 100 automobile dealers participated.

New England Alliance Meets

New England Newspaper Alliance held its March meeting at Boston, March 16. President Charles H. Hastings of the Lynn (Mass.) Item, will entertain the members in that city at the June meeting.

Excavation for the new $9,000,000 National Press Building which will rise on the site of the old Ebbitt House, famous Washington hostelry, scene in its day of many important political gatherings, and a rendezvous of newspaper men. In the background is the New Willard Hotel, scene of the famous Gridiron Club banquets.

GANNETT AGAIN ASKS A. P. MEMBERSHIP

To Seek Election of Rochester Times-Union Over Protest of Journal & Post-Express—A. P. Directors Approve

Frank E. Gannett, president of the Gannett Newspapers, has again filed application for Associated Press membership for the Rochester Times-Union, EDITOR & PUBLISHER was informed this week.

A protest right is held by the Rochester Journal & Post-Express, Hearst newspaper, and a vote will be taken on the issue by the entire A. P. membership at the annual meeting in New York, April 19-24. A vote of 80 per cent of the membership represented at the annual meeting is required to override the protest.

In a letter sent out by Kent Cooper, A. P. general manager on March 18, members were notified that the board of directors of the A. P. will unanimously recommend Mr. Gannett's election. It is the first time in A. P. history that the directorate has taken such a step.

"The protest right of the Rochester Journal and Post-Express, a newspaper owned by Mr. William Randolph Hearst, prevents the Board from electing Mr. Gannett," Mr. Cooper's letter reads.

"As trustees for the entire membership in all matters affecting the welfare of the association, the board, I am instructed to say, unanimously recommends that if you do not expect to attend the annual meeting personally you send your proxy either to an individual member of the board or to some member of the Associated Press who will vote it favorably on Mr. Gannett's application."

William A. Deford, general counsel of the Hearst Corporations, told EDITOR & PUBLISHER he could not discuss the matter pending a meeting of the Hearst Executive Council, scheduled to be held the latter part of this week.

The Times-Union two years ago applied for membership and lost in the subsequent membership vote, following a determined fight carried on by the Hearst newspaper in the protest territory. At that time it was decided that applications for membership must be filed with the A. P. 60 days before the annual meeting, and the members in the protest territory be informed at the same time. That procedure, according to Jackson S. Elliott, assistant general manager of the A. P., was followed in this instance.

COAST DAILY LAUNCHES WEEKLY

San Bernardino Sun Also Remodels Plant and Adds Press

The San Bernardino (Cal.) Sun has moved its composing room and editorial rooms to the second floor, while the advertising department has been given larger space and a new press has been added to the plant's equipment.

Coincident with these changes is the launching by the Sun Company of a weekly paper, El Sol de San Bernardino, circulating among the Spanish-speaking people in the district. Robert Isaias is editor and manager of the new paper, which is issued on Fridays.

Milt Standish, formerly director of advertising, has been appointed assistant business manager of the Sun publications.

A "Letters Back Home" Edition

The Gastonia (N. C.) Daily Gazette issued a 24-page "Letters Back Home" edition, March 13, seven pages being filled with letters from Gastonites now living in other sections of the country. James W. Atkins, editor of the Gazette, is president of the North Carolina Press Association.

Poff Named Concord Publisher

Charles A. Poff, formerly of the Worceter (Mass.) Telegram-Gazette advertising department, has become publisher of the Concord (N. H.) Evening Telegram, succeeding Lawrence J. Moynihan, who founded the paper last fall.

WHY JUMP INTO THE "HASTY CONCLUSION FIRE"?

Reportorial Snap Judgments Frequently Result in Libel Suits—Dangers of Mistakes in Photographs—"Accuracy First" Essential to Newspaper Protection

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

An edition's deadline is approaching. The reporter or picture editor is positive he is right. There is no time for complete verification.

Much better, however, to leave out the story than run a chance of incurring a $50,000 libel suit, a member of the Hearst legal staff advises.

Assigned by William A. DeFord, general counsel of the Hearst Corporations, to study the causes of libel suits, Carl Helm, our lawyer-informant, this week continues his enlightening discussion of libel law, in this the second of a series of articles obtained by EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

THERE was a Marian Brown, a Marion Brown and a Mr. and Mrs. Green. Mrs. Green decided to divorce her husband and named Marian Brown as co-respondent.

Some time before another Mr. Green had presided at a New York convention and as part of the entertainment for delegates, had engaged Marion Brown, a chorus girl, to dance and sing. He had seemed particularly anxious to get newspaper publicity for Marion.

"Aha! Now I know why," said a reporter for a New York newspaper, when the Green divorce suit came into the news. "So she was his sweetheart, eh."

And he dug into the files and got out the pretty entertainer's picture and it was played up in the paper as representing the "co-respondent" in the Green divorce action.

But, unfortunately, it was a different Mr. and Mrs. Green and Mr. Green's alleged sweetheart spelled her Christian name "Marian" with an "a" instead of an "o." The chorus girl saw the picture, retired from the stage, went back to her home town, and brought suit against the New York newspaper for $250,000 damages. On advice of her attorney, she did even more. Several picture syndicates had picked up her photograph, after the first error had been made, and had sent it out to clients over the libellous caption. Scores of newspapers were named defendants in libel actions, and thus good and sufficient reasons were given for the following rule as presented in "Look Out for Libel!" a vestpocket size memorandum, issued by order of the executive council of the Hearst Corporations:

"If a libellous article is printed of one person and it carries with it the photograph of another person as the person concerning whom it is written, the article may be held to be a libel of the person whose photograph is printed, if the jury should find that the public would understand the accompanying photograph to be that of the person to whom the article referred.

"A photograph should not be printed as the photograph of a person of whom a libellous story is printed, without careful verification. It would be much better not to use a photograph at all than to use an unverified photograph."

It seems an easy rule to remember, but my informant, Carl Helm, assigned by William A. DeFord, chief of the Hearst legal department, to study the causes of libel suits, tells me it is frequently broken. Reporters, enthusiastic, anxious to "make good" in the eyes of their editors, jump into the "hasty conclusion fire," and the pungent smoke of a libel suit curls upwards.

"Pictures are always dangerous," Mr. Helm said. "It may be hard to prove malice on the part of a newspaper in court, but it must be remembered that juries penalize negligence and recklessness.

"Verdicts in libel cases are, in theory of law, commensurate to the injury done to the reputation, feelings or business of the person libelled, but juries also may return verdicts irrespective of actual damage done, to penalize a newspaper for gross negligence, carelessness or recklessness in the publication of libellous matter."

Another recent case illustrates this point.

Edwin G. Batterson (this is not his real name) a Princeton graduate, got himself into one of these "love tangles" which frequently make newspaper stories.

A New York newspaper sent one of its hack reporters to Princeton to dig up some background, and, if possible, get a picture of the man concerned, who despised publicity and was successfully evading the cameramen.

The reporter made a round of Princeton photographers, and, in the files of one came across the name "E. F. Batterson." He was doubtful of that middle initial. The photographer, however, anxious to pick up an extra $5, pointed out that the college classes corresponded, and insisted the initial must have been the mistake of his filing clerk. The reporter brought the picture back. His editor trusted him and the picture was published.

In the libel suit that followed the attorney for the newspaper was able to prove that the complainant, Edward F. Batterson, had not been materially damaged by publication of his picture in connection with the Edwin G. Batterson "love tangle" story. It was shown that he had, in fact, been promoted from assistant manager to manager of the concern by which he was employed, since libel action had been started, and further, it was shown, that since publication of the alleged damaging picture he had become a member of several very exclusive clubs to which he had not previously belonged.

Nevertheless, a verdict of $10,000 was returned against the newspaper. The jury explained that this sum represented $2,500 for compensatory damages and $7,500 for the carelessness and recklessness of the reporter and editor concerned in publishing the wrong picture.

"Hasty conclusions on the part of reporters are thus seen to be decidedly expensive, and yet they continue," Mr. Helm declared. "A reporter, assigned to a story requiring considerable investigation will report back to his editor after a hard and almost fruitless day. From a few scattered scraps of fact he has drawn his own conclusions, and proceeds to 'talk big' to his editor, in order to make his story stand up for publication.

"'Go to it,' his editor says. And, under such circumstances, it is very possible a libel suit lies in wait around the corner.

"Victor Watson, Hearst editor, asked once to define his ideal of a reporter, drew the following word picture:

"'He is a man of clear discernment with the ability so often lacking in men to understand the difference between facts and conclusions. He can write.

"'I always feel that when he makes a statement to me, it is an exact exposition of the true facts as they will be found in any resultant litigation.

"'He combines qualities of not allowing himself to be fooled and not desiring to fool his associates.

"'He has an unusual personality which enables him to win confidences quickly and without misrepresentation on his part to induce people to tell him the truth.'

"This is the type of man who would appeal to any newspaper editor. He is not the sort who jumps into the hasty conclusion fire, but rather he would be inclined to follow the apt slogan devised by Dean Walter Williams of the School of Journalism of the University of Missouri, which reads:

"'When in doubt, leave it out.'"

Because the title "editor" is appended to a man's name, proof usually that he has had long experience as reporter on the newspaper firing line, it does not follow that he is immune from making too hasty conclusions.

Mr. Helm, supplying the facts forming the basis for this series, tells me editors frequently walk the dangerous libel plank through their own fault.

"Why that's been printed before, it's all right," they say to the lawyer, who calls their attention to the fact that a story they want to print is libellous. Or they say, "All the papers in town are carrying it, why shouldn't we?"

Mr. Helm, however, calls attention to the fact that a newspaper that publishes a report furnished by a news association, or a story lifted from another newspaper, is just as responsible for the publication of that report as if the news item originated with the newspaper itself. If such reports have a dangerous quality they should be verified before use.

Under the heading "Fair Play Through Verification," the Hearst libel booklet states:

"The newspaper should interview the person to whom a libellous story relates, if possible, so that they may in that way obtain verification of the story, or at least show such a sense of fair play as would mitigate the effect of an erroneous publication."

And then continues:

"Counter statements made by a person concerning whom a story is written, should be printed as they are given, assuming that they do not libel another, for the deletion of a statement may be construed to indicate malice upon the part of the publisher.

"Juries may infer actual malice on the part of a newspaper in the publication of a story, which a reporter writes and turns in, in a spirit of exaggeration or wanton and reckless disregard of the truth and especially where the means of ascertaining the truth are readily available.

"Where, before suit is brought, it is ascertained that a libellous and false publication has been made a retraction should immediately be published. The retraction should unreservedly withdraw all imputations and express regret for having made them.

"It should not be grudgingly or ambiguously made, but should be full and frank, though it need not be abject. A guarded half-hearted apology will only injure the newspaper's position.

"The newspaper is not bound to insert an apology dictated by the complaining party, but it must be such as an impartial person would consider reasonably satisfactory—such a correction as any honorable person would make of an unintentional mistake.

"The retraction should be published in as conspicuous a place and manner as the article complained of.

"In most jurisdictions, a retraction published even after suit is commenced may be introduced in mitigation of damages.

A refusal to retract the defamatory statement is admissible to show actual malice, and in many jurisdictions will afford a basis for punitive damages, in addition to compensatory damages.

"Safety first, or accuracy first, are essential to the protection of the newspaper against liability for libellous publications. The effort to give ascertained facts a sensational character, unwarranted by those facts, often leads to the publication of libellous matter.

"It is not only important that an article containing matter which is libellous if untrue, should be known by the reporter to be true; but it is also important that he should know that it is provably true. A libellous story unprovably true is as dangerous as a story that is false.

"It is up to a newspaper in defending a libel action, to prove that the article is true. It is not enough for the reporter to know that it could be shown to be true if he could get the proofs, but he ought to know (or should have good reason to believe) that the proofs would be available if action is brought."

Next week this series will be continued with an answer to the question: "When are statements privileged?"

LAWRENCE SAYS COPY DESK WEAKEST LINK IN MODERN NEWSPAPER

Copy Reader Makes or Breaks Paper, Says Washington Writer, But Low Pay Bars Out Competent Recruits— Discusses His U. S. Daily

THE two weak spots in American newspaper offices today are the copy desk and the editorial sanctum, David Lawrence, editor of the United States Daily and president of the Consolidated Press Association, told the Alumni Association of the Pulitzer School of Journalism, Friday evening, March 19. He laid this weakness to the poor pay of copy readers and editorial writers.

DAVID LAWRENCE

"It is unfortunate but true," he declared, "that the copy desk is the weakest link in the whole chain of newspaper production. It isn't realized that the copy desk is the center of the whole scheme of things. When copy is handed to a reader he becomes for the time the editor of the paper, and the copy reader makes or breaks the paper. Yet I know that sometimes a newspaper will spend $100,000 to get copy and then let some low salaried man handle it."

With this exception, Mr. Lawrence asserted, the modern newspaper is more efficient than it ever has been before.

"The newspapers of America are better than those of any other country, not excepting Great Britain," he said. "I believe that the newspapers of this country render greater service to their communities than any other unit in those communities."

Speaking of his new national newspaper, the United States Daily, Mr. Lawrence declared that its purpose was to bridge the gap of ignorance between the people and the government of the United States, and to reach the people indirectly through the key group of persons, such as editorial writers, who desire serious and accurate information on governmental activities, furnished without bias. The contention that selection of the news to go into the new paper involved the expression of opinion was unfounded, he said, because "we intend to print everything that the government does that we can get our hands on, and we will increase the size of the paper rather than leave anything out."

In the United States Daily, the speaker said, the editors are reversing some of the well-known rules of newspaper making.

"Our first page is not made up of the most sensational items," he continued. "The test is not sensationalism but importance to the greatest number of people, although we have not yet achieved an efficient working out of this formula. Our first page will contain the items of greatest importance, our second page those of next importance, and so on until we reach the back page, which will be devoted to items of interest to special groups."

Mr. Lawrence stressed the value of training in schools of journalism as a preparation for other fields of work as well as for the profession of journalism itself. He looks forward to the inclusion of courses in journalism in the curriculum of every university within the next ten years.

"I think we will witness a time," he went on, "when people who have no intention of going into newspaper work will take courses in journalism. I think that the whole scheme of it will prove valuable in many lines of work. Many stay in journalism only a few years, frequently going on to important executive positions in the business world. It is because newspaper work demands versatility of mind, quickness of thought, and a general education, which make one a preferred person in business. Journalism, a term regarded a few years ago as academic, has become a most practical one."

In discussing the important place held by newspapers in America today, Mr. Lawrence said:

"We must measure the amount of service a newspaper renders to its community by comparing it with any other commercial institution, and by seeing whether any other institution does as much for the public as the newspaper does. I believe we are doing a remarkably good job in our American newspapers.

"Of course there are defects, but I have read many criticisms which I think are unwarranted. I think we can put our finger on the two defects in the American newspaper of today when we take a look at the copy desk and the editorial sanctum. If there is the need for reform of the American newspaper, it is on the copy desk. Most of the mistakes are due to incompetent copy desk men.

"I think that the publishers are beginning to realize this. They say that they need good copy readers. One difficulty is that good copy readers are even more scarce than good workers in any other line. Another thing that makes it difficult to fill the copy desk with good men is that there are many promotions. If a man distinguishes himself on the copy desk the chances are he will be advanced to the head of the desk and then to an editorship in a short time.

"And if we examine the editorial staffs on modern newspapers, we once in a while find that the foreman of the composing room is getting more money than the chief editorial writer. There must be a recognition of the work of the editorial writer if we are to have good newspapers. We have heard a good deal about the decline of the editorial page. I think one reason for this is the fact that the compensation of the editorial writer is not adequate. I have never found men good enough to write editorials at the present pay.

"Those are the only two things about the modern newspaper that if I had my way I would change. I think we have just as good men on the staffs today as the men who used to write column stories, in spite of the criticisms of the methods and the speed of getting news. The ingredients and the brain power are there.

"We must admit that the newspapers now are excercising a different kind of influence from what they did 15 or 20 years ago. They have less influence on partisan thought. The kind of influence they have now is that which starts with the dissemination of accurate and colorful information. Newspapers are better on foreign news than they used to be. I can remember when one and a half columns on foreign news was a great deal to print. They are better on financial news. In some cases double the space is given to financial news to what was given a few years ago. They are better on sporting news; they are beginning to understand the human relations in sports. They are getting better in their treatment of amateur sports and are looking with critical eyes on the professionals."

To illustrate the possibilities of newspaper service to the public, Mr. Lawrence cited the case of a young man just out of college who inherited a paper in a city that had fallen down in its rivalry with a nearby city. The young man did not like the idea of having newspapers come in from other cities into his own, and he set about aggressively to build up his paper. Today his circulation has increased remarkably and his profits are over a million dollars a year. Recently that city raised $10,000,000 for a university in ten days, a feat impossible a few years previously.

"All through the United States," Mr. Lawrence declared, "there seem to me to be two classes of newspapers, and in many cities you can pick them out. Call them A and B. A is a paper of substance which believes in merchandising a product of news plus some entertainment; B is 80 per cent entertainment and 20 per cent news. I think that the largest profits are being made by the papers that believe in substance."

GIRL'S 44 LIBEL SUITS SETTLED OUT OF COURT

Her Picture Used in Connection With Divorce Suits Basis of Actions —Picture Services Involved

Forty-four suits started against newspapers and picture syndicates by Alyce McCormick, formerly of Ziegfeld Follies, charging libel because of the alleged wrongful use of her picture in connection with a divorce suit story, were settled out of court in Chicago March 19. The amount of the settlement was not made known.

Attorneys for the defendants united in attempting to effect the settlement. They were William A. Deford, general counsel of the Hearst Corporations; MacDonald Dewitt, representing P. & A. Photos, and Newton D. Baker, former Secretary of War, for NEA Service, Inc.

On Nov. 30, 1925, Emma A. Miller filed a petition for divorce in the Court of Common Pleas at Franklin, Pa., against her husband Charles Miller, former Brigadier General in the Pennsylvania National Guard. She named as co-respondent an Alice McCormack.

The story so came over the wires, but a member of the staff of the New York Mirror, jumped at the conclusion that the co-respondent was Alyce McCormick, who had been connected with a show in which one Miller, who runs an antique shop on Madison avenue, New York, had had some connection. From the newspaper files the reporter got Miss Alyce McCormick's picture and it was published Dec. 1 in connection with the Miller divorce suit.

The picture was also sent out to clients by the defendant picture syndicates.

Nathan Cook, of Cleveland, attorney for Alyce McCormick, made the following statement to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, in response to a telegraphic inquiry from EDITOR & PUBLISHER:

"On about Dec. 2, 1925, Pacific and Atlantic Photos, International Newsreel and Newspaper Enterprise Association sent stories and photos of Alyce McCormick to all their clients in the United States announcing that Alyce McCormick, prize winning beauty and known as Miss Nebraska, who was then a member of the Follies, had been named co-respondent in a divorce suit filed in Oil City, Pa., by the wife of an eighty-three-year-old millionaire named Charles Miller. The story was untrue and thus consequently was libelous per se. The Follies were in Cleveland the week Miss McCormick retained me to represent her.

"After failure of settlement on negotiations with the attorneys representing newspapers and news service agencies, forty-four law suits were actually started and many more had been prepared for filing.

"At this point a legal representative of the Omaha Bee, one of the newspapers publishing the libel, came on the scene with the results that settlements for all newspapers and news agencies were had. It was a settlement dictated personally by Miss McCormick at Chicago last Friday and after which all suits then filed were dismissed and a stipulation made that no future suits would be started.

"Alyce McCormick suits against the newspapers of the United States is a closed incident, satisfied, settled and dismissed."

Defense attorneys declined to discuss the case when questioned by EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

HIGHER TAX ASKED ON U. S. PUBLICATIONS

Agitation by Canadian Publishers Viewed As Unwise by Dr. Finley of New York Times

TORONTO, March 25.—While deputations continue to invade Ottawa, seeking the imposition of a tariff against United States periodicals, people are discussing with interest the opinion of Dr. John Finley, associate editor of the New York Times, who while in Toronto renewing his acquaintance with Lord and Lady Allenby recently, was persuaded to comment on the situation. He expressed the belief that to endeavor to check by means of a tariff, the free flow into Canada of United States publications, would be to set up an artificial barrier against the interchange of ideas between the people of these two countries.

He believed that it would be both unwise and impracticable to try to stem the "intellectual commerce" which was developing and would continue to develop between Canada and the United States, despite any unnatural obstacles which might be set up.

In giving this opinion, Dr. Finley said that, when Canada finds it necessary to ban certain publications because they contain reading matter offensive to the institutions of the British Empire, or because they pander to a perverted taste for salaciousness, the action of the dominion cannot be criticised.

Any attempt, however, to kill or handicap the free entry into Canada of United States newspapers and magazines beyond reproach on moral or patriotic grounds, is, in the opinion of Dr. Finley, to take up the broom of Mrs. Partington and fight against a natural and irresistible process.

"Why attempt to hinder these contacts?" Dr. Finley asked, when he understood that the objects of the present agitation were to discourage by means of taxation, the free circulation of the printed word between Canada and the United States.

The tariff proposal at present being considered is for the imposition of a tax of 10 cents a pound against United States publications.

The last deputation to bring the matter to the attention of the government represented the Magazine Publishers Association of Canada. In presenting their case they pointed out that a total of 40,000,000 copies of United States magazines enter Canada annually while week-end newspapers numbering 15,000,000 are distributed in the dominion each year. They declared that the 10-cents-a-pound tariff proposed would supplement the 15 cent tariff which is now imposed against all advertising matter entering the country other than in publications. Not only were Canadian publications suffering acutely but Canadian manufacturers were being materially injured by cut-throat competition from United States manufacturers whose products could be advertised free of cost. A conservative estimate placed the possible revenue which would accrue to Canada from such a tariff at $5,000,000.

Another Paper Goes 8 Columns

The Jamestown (N. Y.) Post, has become an eight column newspaper, using standard columns and smaller heads on its news items.

Lancaster, Pa., Veteran Dies

Robert Blair Risk, 78, for 25 years editor of the old Lancaster (Pa.) Examiner, and one of the best known newspapermen in Pennsylvania, died March 20 in Lancaster from pneumonia. Mr. Risk was known as "Bob Risk, Sage of the Buck" and since his retirement ten years ago had contributed steadily to the Lancaster New Era, News-Journal and Sunday News. As a young man he studied law and was admitted to the bar, but gave up the legal profession for newspaper work.

NEWSPAPERS USED FOR SPRING STYLE COPY

Julius Kayser & Co. Turns to Exclusive Use of Dailies in General Campaign Advertising Three Products—"We Are Stealing Thunder from the Retailers," Advertising Manager Explains

By GRACE WALTON
Advertising Manager of Julius Kayser & Co.

For more than three years, Miss Grace Walton, has directed the advertising of Julius Kayser & Co., makers of silk gloves, hosiery, and underwear. She has made it her business to study local markets carefully, and for this purpose last December completed a Coast to Coast trip visiting big cities and working behind retail store counters to study the buying habits of the public.

She herewith submits her contribution as first of a new series of articles written by advertisers for EDITOR & PUBLISHER on the subject:

"Why I make newspapers the backbone of my advertising campaign."

IE sequel can now be written to the story of an advertiser's transcontinl trip to meet Mr. and Mrs. Coner, with a view to learning the public ce of the best advertising media.

made the trip, as previously reported EDITOR & PUBLISHER, and now I am y to announce that newspapers are g used exclusively in our spring style paign which began this month and is ntinue through April.

or the spring campaign 56 newspapers being used in leading cities of the try. The newspaper which carried most department store advertising in city was selected. The campaign n with full page space and to continue a week using six full columns.

he copy differs from that usually oyed by national advertisers in that designed to follow in appearance the tral run of large retail store advertiseis in local dailies, and also in that one column of the six carries editorialadvertising under a box head and d by Sarah Van Rensselaer.

is is the first time any manufacturer dvertised three different lines of merdise together in single copy in retail at. In several instances I have n of manufacturers promoting more one product similarly in one adverent, but it has been part of a straight tutional campaign.

wspapers are the best media for copy. In the magazines it becomes ly an institutional proposition. In newspapers, by using display copy, the editorial column as part of the space, the advertiser is not only g style merchandise, but is building will as well.

A little more than three years ago, I first came to Julius Kayser & Co., irm was using largely rotogravure he magazines. In the last year we come to devote 75 per cent of the we purchase to black and white e daily newspapers. We invest $300,000 a year now in this one m.

Vy do I make newspapers the backof my advertising?

you judge a horse by the way it s feet? Yes, I would say you can know anything about horses. Can dge advertising by the results you ? Yes, I would say you can if you anything about advertising.

m experience and knowledge I have to find an infallible and correct hd for a manufacturer to measure in a and cents the results obtained from avertising campaign—whether it be ines, billboards, or newspapers.

n have all the records, all of the s, all of the methods in the world—is impossible for me to go to these s, point to a town and say, "I spent dollars during the spring season had a 25 per cent increase."

advertising manager knows that a percentage is due to salesmen's t to general conditions, to the merce, to the advertising—what pro is due to each is an unknown ty.

f this being a fact, I have stopped ng my head against that brick wall n going after results in another tn—results that can pretty well be .

ask myself the following question, a types of advertising pull the most tnd successful results?" There is der—that's out of the question for nfacturer—there is coupon advertisnich is again an impossible undergor a house dealing direct through e iler—then there is retail advertisle by the retailer in daily newss—and newspapers only. This we word for word and space for it we can jolly well try to follow in his footprints instead of running down a crossroad.

Looking at the situation through one pair of eyes instead of two—since it is boiled down to one problem instead of two—it is easy to see that the retailer's object is to advertise to the consumer to sell merchandise—and by the same token that is our object as long as we persist in spending the main portion of our advertising appropriation in mediums which go direct into the hands of the consumer.

Six full columns, one of which simulates news, tell newspaper readers the Kayser story.

Advertising to the retailer is no uncertain quantity. He knows exactly how much he spends and how much he gets in return. His city and its surounding territory are his only problems. It is up to him to study them, analyze them, and comb them in order to increase his sales to the very highest possible percentage. He must know the population as it is divided in wealth—he must know the mediums which reach the different classes—he must know the appeal that will hit the mark. These are his problems and he knows them—or ought to—inside out.

As an advertising manager for a manufacturer, sitting in New York holding the reins of not one city but one hundred cities, I find it impossible to analyze the situation as carefully or in as detailed a fashion. What can be done, however, is to steal as much thunder from the retailer of each city as possible.

And so, for the first time, we brought out an advertising campaign illustrating and pushing three lines at the same time in the same manner as the retailer would—making style the center spoke. This campaign is appearing in newspapers throughout the country where retailers who advertise Kayser products place their advertising—because they place it in the papers that will bring results. Now, if I can get direct results for those that are selling our merchandise I am doing all that can be expected—and the campaign can be termed a huge success.

Another reason why we are advertising three different lines in retail fashion in newspaper space is to bring our style merchandise before the consumer under one name in the medium that brings the quickest results. We feel we can take this stand now after 47 years of institutional advertising.

This institutional advertising was placed in magazines as well as in newspaper black and white and rotogravure. Our merchandise is right and therefore our many years of advertising have paid satisfactory dividends. You can advertise until you are black in the face, and if your product is not right, it will just be a poor investment.

Our background of business building is behind us. Now we want to talk style, and style is news. There is, we know, a real reader demand for this sort of news, and to supply that demand we are turning to the logical medium—the newspaper. And we agree with the editors that the sort of style news we want to print should appear in retail store fashion in the advertising columns, in attractive layout and with informative and instructive text.

People do answer the newspaper advertisements. There is no question about that.

Women, of course, are always seeking to be informed on the new styles and they look for authentic style news in the newspapers both in the advertising and in the news columns. We want to put style news in paid space.

We want to put style news into paid space.

DAVIS RE-ELECTED DIRECTOR

Munsey Veteran Also Appointed to Executive Board of Company

Robert H. Davis, who completes the twenty-third anniversary of his association with the editorial department of The Frank A. Munsey Company in May, has been re-elected a director. He has also been appointed to the Executive Board, which will function under William T. Dewart, president of the various Munsey organizations.

Mr. Davis, who was making a world tour when the news of Mr. Munsey's death recalled him from Cairo, will return to Egypt with Mrs. Davis early in the fall and complete his sabbatical year, visiting points of interest on the Continent and the British Isles.

The "Bob Davis Recalls" column which Mr. Davis started in the New York Sun a few weeks ago will be supplied with copy from abroad at regular intervals, together with a series of personal observations on European conditons, that are to appear first in the Sun.

Herald Tribune Circulators Dine

The circulation department of the New York Herald Tribune held its annual beefsteak dinner last week at Jansen's Hofbrau. The speakers included State Senator Herman Koppleman; James McKernan, assistant circulation manager of the World; Max Rudensey, wholesale dealer, of Montclair, N. J.; Howard Davis, business manager of the Herald Tribune; Claude H. Sandkam, circulation manager, and Ralph E. Renaud, assistant managing editor.

Two New Dailies in Florida

The Ocala (Fla.) Central Florida Times started publication as a morning newspaper this week. It is an Associated Press Member. H. L. Brittan is the publisher. The Pulaski (Fla.) Southwest Times, of which Paul Cline is publisher, re-entered the daily field with an A. P. membership, after publishing for the past several years as a weekly.

Identifies "Stick-Up" Men

Joseph Schabo, an employe of the Buffalo (N. Y.) Courier, was among the witnesses called upon to identify several alleged hold-up men arrested in New York this week with a recent robbery and murder in Buffalo.

TRAIL BLAZERS OF ADVERTISING

The Matrimonial Bureau

Chapter XXXVII
The Matrimonial Bureau

AT one time Matrimonial Bureau Want Ads occupied a conspicuous place in the newspaper columns. Even newspapers were published exploiting exclusively this branch of American industry.

The most popular form of the matrimonial publicity was the introducing society. Ads such as this appeared:

"Select Introducing Society—Ladies and Gentlemen with matrimonial intentions put in correspondence with each other; three two cent stamps for information and descriptive blank."

When the stamps were received the following letter together with blanks to be filled out were mailed to the applicant if a man. If a woman it was changed to meet the occasion:

"My dear sir:

"You would marry in a minute if you met the dearest, sweetest girl in the world, wouldn't you? Well, if you only knew how quickly and easily we can select an ideal companion for you, we are sure you would not hesitate securing our help at once.

"Do you know that thousands of people go through life miserable and lonely, simply because they have never had an opportunity of finding their ideal? You certainly cannot afford to jeopardize your life's happiness by neglecting this golden opportunity.

"We guarantee to find your ideal. If you are not satisfied the first time, we'll try again and again until you are satisfied. Don't delay. Delays in affairs of the heart are dangerous.

"Now, all we ask of you is to answer the following questions. Please give us the facts just as they exist and it will aid us very much.

"What is your age, weight, height, color of eyes, hair, religion, occupation, nationality and general appearance? Do you use tobacco, are you healthy, are you accomplished in music? What resources have you? Add any further information that you think will assist me in selecting a suitable companion for you. Then describe briefly the kind of a girl you desire to meet, or in other words, describe your ideal. Your name and address will be detached from the paper on which you answer the above questions and your identity will be kept a secret until we have your permission to introduce you to some person whose description suits you. A two-dollar bill should be enclosed with description to defray expenses."

Stories were spread around among advertising men of the fabulous fortunes that were being made out of the matrimonial game.

Agencies thrived in all large cities and ads of various kinds, featuring charming girls with fortunes, or rich, old, dying men. Some of the most unusual lures were hung out to catch the heart hungry.

It was an age when advertising was used to persuade men and women that they should not make their selection of life partners alone.

These matrimonial ads told them that their judgment was bad; that they did not even know their own minds and tastes.

Here were advertising cupids who would give help and guidance in selecting compatible and suitable life partners. Only through advertising was to be found the safe and sure way of meeting the ideal love mate.

Facts and statistics were offered relating to the wonderful opportunities for reliable and respectable people who were searching for life companions.

Through the advertising matrimonial agency it was possible for a man to meet a woman who possessed all the qualifications he most admired; and the particular woman who preferred this particular man to any other in the whole wide world.

Marvelous were the powers of advertising. Glaring publicity alone could obtain soul-mates and affinities.

From the way this kind of advertising grew until Uncle Sam stopped it along in 1900, it seemed that there really was a growing demand for a service in selecting a mate.

Many people answered these ads out of curiosity; others just to strike up a harmless flirtation and have some fun out of it. Others went into it seriously, hoping to meet worthy people who were sincere in their matrimonial intentions.

The old "Personal Ads" with the great luring line of "Matrimonial Intentions" have disappeared from leading newspapers. But for many years the Want-Ad Columns of newspapers administered to the desires and demands of those matrimonially inclined.

No doubt this kind of advertising widened the matrimonial field, and led to much trouble and many disappointments. No greater conceit was ever exhibited than the advertiser who announced that he could choose a husband or wife by mail and bring harmony into the home.

The most trouble was caused by those who, when filling in the blanks describing themselves, lied most outrageously. Earnest men who actually desired to become acquainted with marriagable women were fooled and vicitimized. Thus matrimonial advertising became known as a fake and a fraud.

Silly school girls and irresponsible people, made extravagant claims about themselves and their possessions.

Wealthy widows and widowers were the bait held out in many ads to catch those who were out to marry money. And it was astonishing how many years the old gag worked and the thousands that fell for it.

But the problem of properly mating people was too big for advertising to solve.

One matrimonial agent, taking the business seriously, sought to make his services valuable by requiring a bond, or large deposit of money. This meant that both the prospective bride and groom were compelled to furnish a bond, signed by people of means, assuring good faith on both sides.

This bond further provided that the man would always provide well for his ad-wife; would always conduct himself towards her as a gentlemen, and fail in nothing by which she might be made unhappy. The wife had to agree vice versa.

I never learned what happened to this advertiser. He was too good to last.

I have never collected any data to show whether there were more or less marriages, greater or fewer happy homes, during the reign of the Advertising Matrimonial Agent.

CHAPTER XXXVIII
Outlaws, Frauds, Crooks, Swindlers

ADVERTISING is a business which crooks have thrived on. There never has been a profession or business in which frauds could be perpetrated so easily as in advertising.

Advertising has covered a multitude of crooked games, and yet for the reason that it is publicity it has revealed the swindlers and cast them out or destroyed them.

It would take volumes to tell about the frauds, swindlers and crooked games that have been promoted by means of the greatest power in business—Advertising.

When I look back over the years and see those lurid pictures of old, I wonder how they have thrived.

There were the flourishing advertising quack doctors, painless dentists, fake oil stock and mining stock promoters, and what not?

The printed word was overworked to hoodwink, delude and cheat the public.

It is not my purpose to go into the detail regarding operations of the big fake promoters, but to tell something about the lowest order of advertising swindlers.

They were the petty buccaneers who worked fake advertising schemes through the want-ad columns of newspapers.

In many large cities there operated at one time a class of petty crooks, swindlers and fakers who attempted to eke out a half-way existence through the "Want Ad" columns.

These crooks were smooth operators who usually placed blind advertisements designed as traps for purchasers and investors, and those seeking employment, or looking for opportunities for advancement.

The majority of questionable schemes were found under the classification of "Help Wanted" and "Personal." It was here that those out of employment looked for situations, and they were usually susceptible to the glittering offers of the want ad fakers.

The schemes that were worked called for cleverness and ingenuity. Some of these schemes involved careful plotting, a wide knowledge of human nature, and a clear head on the part of the crook.

The cleverest crook in this class I ever heard of was a smooth schemer who placed a blind want ad in a large city newspaper for a doorman for an exclusive club. There was nothing suspicious about the advertisement as it was worded just as were dozens of others. The men who answered the advertisement were asked to call at a certain hotel on a certain day and at a certain hour. Each man at a different time, and during the interview he was told that he could have the position if he would pay $18 for a uniform. If he did not have the money, he was told to come back the next day at a certain hour. In this way the applicants did not meet each other. When a man turned over his $18 he was given an order on a large department store for a uniform, which he was to obtain two days later.

When the ten applicants, who had each paid the schemer $18 presented their orders at the department store, they were told that the store knew nothing about any uniforms that were to be delivered. The duped applicants made a rush for the hotel, but the crook had flown. The matter was turned over to the police, but they could get no trace of the swindler. Several of the applicants had borrowed the $18 and to all ten its loss meant a hardship to them or their families.

A great many men and women have been swindled by want ad crooks who advertised for salesmen, and offered the applicants positions paying high salaries, providing the applicants deposited $100 or $200 as security. Then the crooks disappeared and were seldom or never located.

Confidence games were operated in nearly every line of business, but not all escaped. A young lady cashier at a movie theatre captured a glib faker. She had ambitions. She wanted to become a part of the celluloid dreamland she saw eve day—to be made love to, to wear pret gowns, to ride in automobiles and to ha wonderful adventures.

While in this enraptured frame of mi she was an easy victim for a faker w advertised that he would find positio for girls who wanted to become mo actresses.

The girl was to pay him $100 to obt the position for her. However, mother decided the man was a fraud a called up the movie company he was s posed to represent. They told her th had never heard of him.

The girl made up her mind to capt this crook. She paid him the money a she was told that she would have to p for him. He suggested that she disr and drape herself to pose as Kiplin "Vampire Lady." The girl retired, tensibly to pose, but instead she t phoned the police. While the faker w waiting the police arrived and he w arrested.

In one large city, a smooth crook r the "Lost and Found" column regula Where a residence address was given connection with the lost article, swindler would call and tell the lady the house that he had seen the adv tisement offering a reward for the article.

"Have you got it?" she would ask pectantly.

"No," he would answer, "but brother, who lives at Blanksville (a n by town) has it. I'd go down and ge for you but I haven't any money."

Then the woman usually gave him amount of the fare to the nearby to which would be a dollar or two. result was the man never came back his reward and the lady who lost the ticle was out the carfare she advanced.

Another kind of a want ad crook erated in a dozen cities. He was kn as "The Tape Measure Man." He the want ad columns for illegitimate poses. An innocent looking ad, someth like this usually appeared:—

"WANTED: Young lady—Reg Features, pose for advertising. R Room 476—180 Main Street, 3 to 5, M day."

A young lady who answered an ad tisement of this kind went to a detec bureau and registered a complaint of man's actions toward her. She said answered the advertisement in good f but she resisted when the man mad improper proposal to her.

When the girl complained, detec rushed to the office and found fifteen waiting in an outer office. The detec found a sheet of paper containing measurement notations, and the " Measure Man" was arrested and cha with assault and battery.

Another master of sharp practice vertised himself as, "the lady sudd called abroad and forced to sacrifice beautiful furniture." He was also, unhealthy gentlemen ordered to De contents of eight room flat for sale, ch He was, "the discouraged widow gcii boarding, take parlor suite at own pr All these parts he played in the cour his regular business of selling furnitu

He worked the game for years, finally another "con" man dazzled with word pictures of the busy, h workers engaged in taking gold by bucketful from a "Lucky Gold M The furniture faker bought so muc the fake mining stock, he was forced bankruptcy, and the whole story of one "con" man trimmed another trir came out in the newspapers.

DAILY TOOK GUESSWORK FROM MARKET SURVEY

Milwaukee Journal Obtained Bona Fide, Carefully Checked Figures on Sales of Advertised Goods by Offering Filled Shopping Bags Valued at $3 to Housewives Who Returned Questionnaires in Person

By W. J. DAMM,
Merchandising & Research Bureau, Milwaukee Journal

THERE is nothing new in the compilation by newspapers of market surveys, purporting to give information manufacturers, dealers, advertising agencies, and others, on the use and possible demand for their products in a localized market. A considerable number of metropolitan newspapers have made such compilations for a period of years. Nearly all of these surveys, however, have been based on dealers' estimates of consumer demand, or on checks of dealer stocks, and neither those who promote such inquiries nor those who are supposed to base advertising and sales campaigns on the findings, have any too great confidence in the results obtained.

It was dissatisfaction with the guesswork involved in basing its reports and surveys of the market upon interviews with retailers and jobbers, which led the Milwaukee Journal in 1922 to seek out some better method of ascertaining the facts.

Who should be the information source? The dealer? Dealers' estimates are only as reliable as the dealer's ability to guess right. The jobber? Jobbers' data, even though taken from records, show sales for the total territory merchandised by them. The consumer? No one could give more accurate information on the products he used or didn't use than the consumer; but how to get enough consumers to answer a question? The telephone was not thought of, for if a housewife were called to the phone she might possibly answer one, two, or three questions, and then bang would go the receiver. Even if she were ever so willing to give replies to a long list of interrogations, there would be questions she could not answer properly without a preliminary inquiry of her own.

Cost also had to be considered. After much consideration of the problem, a plan was decided upon which, if it produced "true survey" recognized as authorative, would, it was believed, justify the expenditure of $18,000 which the Journal appropriated for the purpose. This first survey included only package goods sold in grocery stores, the total questions numbering approximately 50. The 1926 questionnaire contained 382 questions requiring upward of an hour to answer.

The general plan for its compilation was founded upon two basic and accepted principles. The first of these is a principle accepted by the United States government and all insurance statisticians, namely, that where 3 per cent returns are secured in answer to any questionnaire submitted to any industry, community, or other group from which information is sought, any percentage resulting from compilation of these returns may be applied as representing the entire industry, community or group—and that when so applied the resulting statistics represent the most nearly correct approximations obtainable for the entire industry, community, or group.

The second principle, which has been established in original experiments, is that when a representative number of names are taken from each of the pages of the city directory, analysis of these names shows that the number in each of the various classes and groups, such as poor, medium, wealthy, etc., is in the same ratio to the total names selected as the total of these various classes and groups is to the total population.

With these principles to guide it, the Journal's merchandising bureau prepared and printed a carefully worded questionnaire, and picked to receive it in excess of 10,000 names at random from the Milwaukee city directory, as a cross-section of the community's buying habits.

This questionnaire, like all the succeeding questionnaires sent to the housewives, made a plain statement of the Journal's purpose, and then offered to "buy" an hour of the housewife's time, for which the paper agreed to pay $3.00. Payment was not made in cash, however, but in full size and sample packages of advertised products valued at the amount indicated, and contained in a shopping bag.

It was required that the questionnaire be honestly and completely answered, returned in person to the Merchandising & Research Bureau, and be checked by a member of the department before the shopping bag was delivered.

From the beginning, Greater Milwaukee housewives responded. The first year's returns showed 30 per cent of all questionnaires mailed were answered and returned. The check of the returned questionnaires showed that the various groups of poor, medium, wealthy, etc., were in direct proportion to the total population in each group. While this may at first seem extraordinary, human nature must be taken into account, as well as the fact that during the time the questionnaires were out, considerable news publicity was used in an attempt to educate all classes to answer the questionnaire. That all classes do answer it has been proved by other publishers who have investigated this method of analysis, as well as by several manufacturers who have taken the time to check the returned questionnaires for their own satisfaction.

Knowing what percentage of returns to expect, as determined by the first and succeeding years, it is comparatively simple to know at the present time the approximate number of questionnaires to mail out. As a result of news publicity and word of mouth advertising, more than 2,500 telephone calls are received each year from persons who did not receive a questionnaire and who want one. Complying with such requests, while it would save much time and expense, would throw off the cross section obtained by the voluntarily returned questionnaires, and therefore such calls have to be unsatisfied.

The principal data compiled from the returned questionnaires is outlined in the following paragraphs. Naturally, because the Milwaukee Journal compiles a survey of this kind each year, as the years go on greater compilations are possible; and manufacturers have available at the present time a six-year record which, compared with advertising and merchandising activities, gives a comprehensive analysis of results.

The first group of figures obtained from returned questionnaires is that which shows the number and percentage of Greater Milwaukee families divided into two groups, users and non-users. These figures are compiled for each of the principal commodities, such as coffee, tea, automobiles, radios, etc.

Having the questionnaires divided into two groups, users and non-users, the user questionnaires are sorted into those using each of the individual brands of each commodity.

Having the total number of families in Greater Milwaukee using each commodity, it is comparatively simple to determine the percentage and number using each individual brand. Included in this commodity data, as for instance in coffee, figures are presented showing the number of families using each brand, such as Silver Buckle, Webb, etc. This information having been obtained, a comparison with previous years shows the fluctuations which, when contrasted with advertising and merchandising activities, indicates the results obtained.

Dealer distribution is also shown in these consumer analyses, and is the result of careful store inventory check-up made by trained investigators. Not less than 10 per cent of the stores in any given line are called on. Such a check-up is not based on dealer interviews, but is gotten by the investigator who obtains permission from the retailer to spend the necessary time in the store for a personal inventory check-up. These check-ups last anywhere from two to four hours each, and are made at the same time the questionnaires are being answered by the housewives.

Per capita consumption as compiled in the surveys is the average consumption of persons who are really users of a product, and not a consumption based upon taking an estimated total consumption and dividing it by the total population.

Per capita consumption figured on the basis of actual users gives the manufacturer a correct idea as to how much a family uses of his line of products, and not an arbitrary figure such as is obtained when the total population is divided into estimated consumption. Per capita consumption figured from total population presents a distorted estimate of market volume. It is not fair in that it accepts a per capita volume and estimated market volume on the assumption that the whole market population is using the product. The Milwaukee Journal method of compilation considers the actual per capita use as reported from 4000 representative families, and market volume totals are based on actual users of the product, not total market population. It is readily understood that thousands of families do not use, and have not been educated to use, particular lines of products. When per capita consumption is figured to include these, a certain amount of each product is credited to families that do not use it at all, and, therefore, the average amount used by average users appears less than it really is. We believe that the average manufacturer wants to know how much the families who are using his product use in a given period of time.

Volume figures are also presented in these analyses. They are gotten by taking the per family consumption and multiplying it by the total number of families using a given commodity. The figures shown are presented only as approximations. Common sense tells us that conditions are constantly changing; that a number of families who are package coffee users part of the year, may have gone to bulk coffee because of price changes, and that families may be influenced to the use of new products, due to merchandising and advertising during the year. The only way in which absolutely correct volume figures could ever be compiled would be to base answers to the questionnaires on an actual year's consumption, which is, of course, just as much a fallacy as asking the retailer to approximate his yearly sales.

The cost of getting the Journal's consumption analyses is not as great as might be expected. The contents of the shopping bags are furnished by manufacturers merchandising and advertising in the Milwaukee market. They realize the great value of having a sample or full sized package go to 4000 housewives in the name of the Milwaukee Journal. It offers them an ideal method of sampling. The housewife is doing something to obtained the goods, and for this reason has a far greater respect for what she receives than she would if it were left at her door, or given to her at some store demonstration. Even the bag could be obtained in this way, but the Journal believes that the advertising value obtained from 4000 of these bags imprinted with its advertisement fully justifies the monetary expense involved.

The biggest item of cost is clerical help. Checking the questionnaires as they are received is done by permanent members of the Merchandising & Research Department, who are thoroughly familiar with past analyses, brands under each commodity classification, and so forth.

SAN ANGELO (TEX.) STANDARD OCCUPIES NEW $50,000 HOME

THE San Angelo (Tex.) Standard has moved into its new fireproof home and on May 4 will celebrate its forty-second year with a formal house warming to which the people of the 15 West Texas counties which it serves will be invited to not only inspect the plant but to see it in full operation.

At this time a stained glass window portraying J. G. Murphy, the pioneer printer and editor who established the Standard on May 4, 1884, will be unveiled by his daughter, Miss May Murphy. Mr. Murphy sold the paper in 1920 to Houston Harte.

The building, which is two stories and basement is built entirely of brick, concrete, steel and composition stone. It is situated on an inside corner on the principal street of the city and a half block from the center of the city. It cost $50,000.

The business office, advertising, circulation and classified departments occupy the first 40 feet of the ground floor. Editorial offices are upstairs.

STRANGE CONTRASTS IN PRESS LAWS OF VARIOUS NATIONS

British Foreign Office Compiles Large Volume of Foreign Statutes as Result of Recent British Agitation for Drastic Regulation

By HUGH J. HARLEY

ONE of the most interesting compilations concerning the publishing business in many years has been issued by the British Foreign Office as a result of recent agitation for the imposition of drastic legislation regulating matter in the newspapers and periodicals of the United Kingdom. It is a weighty volume entitled "The Press Laws of Foreign Countries," edited by Montague Sherman and O. T. Raynor and is published by His Majesty's Stationery Office at the price of 15 shillings net. The Foreign Office undertook the assembling of laws regulating the Press of foreign countries more than a year ago by requesting that its consular and diplomatic agents obtain full and exact information and in making public the result has expressed the hope that it may be of general use to journalists rather than to lawyers only. The book was reviewed recently by the London Times.

It is likely that limited requests for copies of this publication from newspaper publishers and editors in the United States would be complied with, providing that an allowance is made in the payment draft for the cost of postage. The volume is quite bulky.

The general laws regulating the press parallel each other quite closely in most countries, their main objects being: to defend the ruling power from such attacks as are likely to bring it into peril or contempt; to provide the individual with a weapon against libel; and to prevent the diffusion of articles or pictures "against honor and chastity" as the Persian law very neatly declares. The publication of inaccurate news is often considered as an offense but not in all countries.

The book reveals that there is similarity in the principles dealing with the formalities of newspaper production such as registration, but when the editing of these papers is approached there are distinct national differences of treatment. Many countries insist that the editor shall be native born and some very strictly provide for special personal qualifications —an inspiration at least toward the safe and authoritative use of the newspaper as a great agency for public welfare or injury. Japan, for example, excludes from office "persons incompetent or quasi-incompetent to manage their own affairs." Greece requires that its editors must have studied ancient Greek and orders also that they shall be "physically capable"—which may or not mean what you think.

The suggestion has been made that it might be a means of assuring that editors shall be handy with their fists and the "choice of weapons" which made the old time journalism of Mark Twain's stories and an earlier generation what the insurance companies would call a "hazardous occupation."

The editor has to shoulder a share of responsibility for all that is published in his paper in all countries where regulations exist, but some permit him to shift the onus to a great extent to the author of an objectionable article. Russia has erected a unique editorial council named the Gosizdat which must pass on every manuscript before it is set up in type. The presumption is that this State Publishing Department can libel neither the citizens nor itself, being a part of the sovereign power.

There is an amazing amount of ingenuity shown in old world and new world legislation devising penalties for editorial indiscretions, or "neglect" as it is termed in the Balkan regions. Mere fines and imprisonment form the substantial punishments, of course, but Guatemala combines the two by providing imprisonment from six months to a year commutable wholly or in part at the rate of from two reals to five pesos a day, the scale being adjusted to the pecuniary ability of the culprit. Italy provides for confiscation of the newspaper; Greece condemns the editor to temporary or final dismissal; Persia orders him to pay a fine with a "religious guarantee" the nature of which is not explained. Peru has had a refined sort of torture in store for errant writers since 1823 under the law which provides that:

"The authors or publishers of printed publications described as obscene or repugnant to good morals shall be liable to a fine equivalent to the value of 1,500 copies at the selling price, and if they are unable to pay the amount in question, they shall be required during the period of four months to inter corpses in the cemetery."

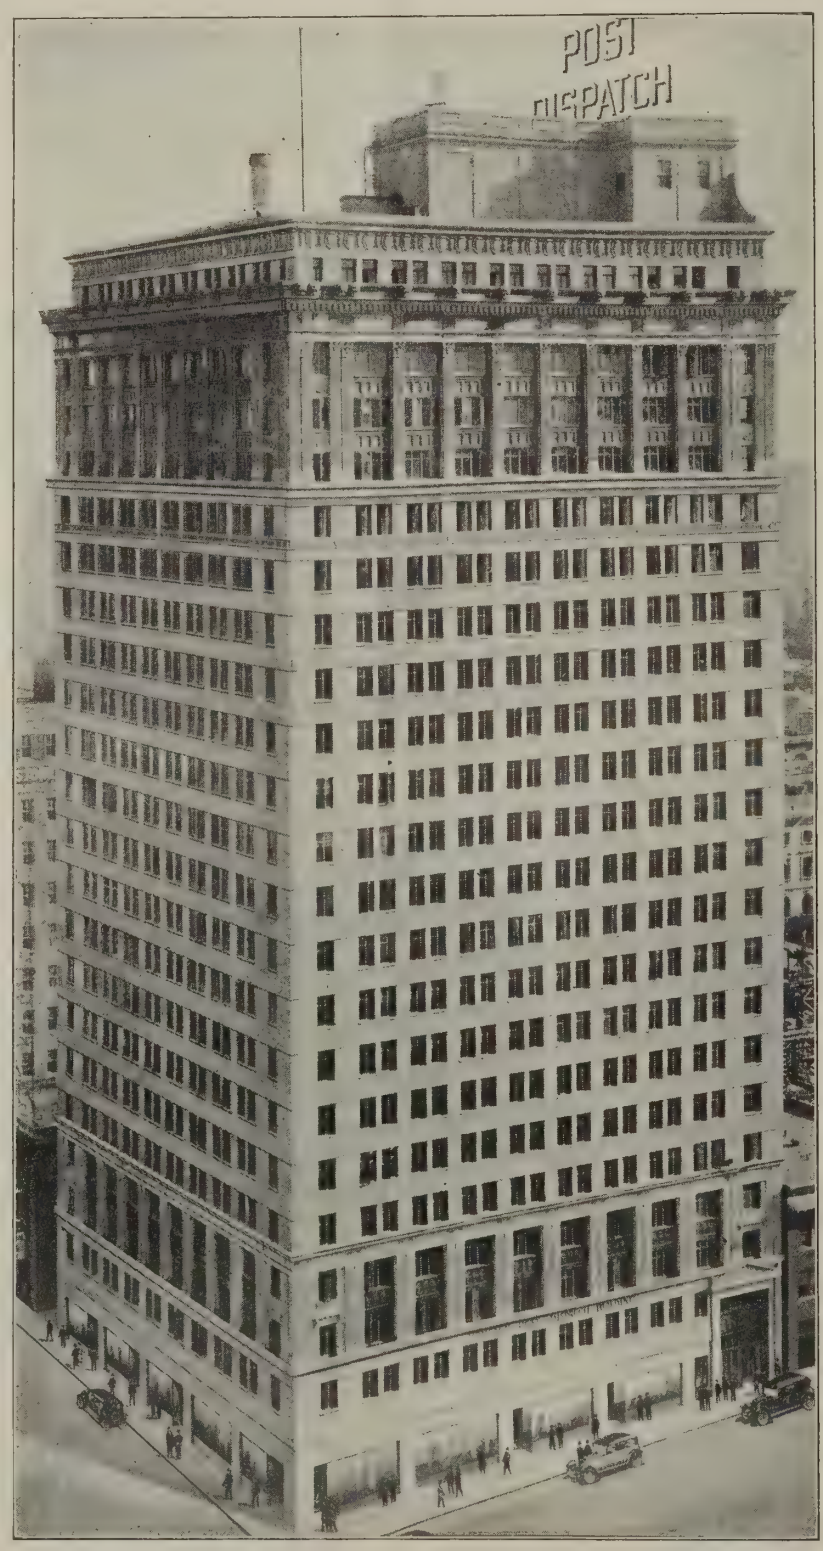
The offense known in England and the United States as contempt of Court can be committed in other countries under strange definitions. China explicitly prohibits it as "any statement which tends to excite the public to plead in an unauthorized manner for criminals or for the accused in a criminal case, or to injure the accused in a criminal case." Brazil has taken a flyer in advanced legislation by prohibiting the publication or advertisement of "quack" medicines which are not approved by the Director General of Public Health.

The laws against political offenses or charges against officials provide some queer material. Some are capable of broad interpretation. In Italy, for example, there is a prohibition against the publication of adherence to "another form of government." This is not the day of Mussolini or his followers, but dates to a period nearer the time of Mazzini, Garibaldi and Cavour. Colombia directs that newspapers and other periodicals must state their "political color" and provides:

"When charges are made against a public official, especially in matters of handling of public moneys, and when in accordance with the present law he shall have justified his behavior, the journalist must state whether the charges made have or have not been satisfactorily answered. This statement must appear in the next issue of the periodical under the penalty of a fine of from 50 to 100 pesos. If the statement is made in the sense that in the opinion of the journalist the charges are not answered, or if the official is not satisfied, the journalist may bring an accusation against the official within ten days of the presentation of the official's justification, under penalty of a fine equal to that above mentioned. If, after making the accusations, the journalist is unable to prove the charges or charges made, he shall be liable to a fine of from 100 to 500 pesos."

Special precautions are taken in some countries against divulging the country's commercial negotiations. There are heavy penalties in Sweden, for instance, for publishing a contract concluded with the Waterfalls Board for the supply of electric power.

The dead are protected against libel, slander, and insult in a number of countries; Finland punishes the offense against such a law with six months' imprisonment or a fine. The legal obligations on newspapers to print conspicuous corrections of wrong statements is widespread and is in force from Finland to Haiti, in large nations and small. In most cases it is provided that the correction shall occupy as much space as the original misstatement.



Roumania protects the editor to some extent by declaring that the correction need not be more than twice the length of the original article and in the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes it "must be of great length and consist of the whole column of the paper or of an article twice the length of the article which gave rise to it." There is a requirement, however, that the article of correction prepared presumably by the injured party "must be drawn up in proper form."

The Portuguese require that where an article is published which might be construed as detrimental to any person, "the person may notify the author or editor as the case may be, and ask whether it was intended to refer to him. If the author or editor states that it was not intended for the person in question he shall not be sued."

Appeals for the collection of funds to defray fines and costs imposed as penalties, or acknowledgment of receipt of contributions is prohibited in France, Germany and other countries. Hungary provides legislation regulating the economic relation between the publisher and his salaried staff. The law states that "the time for which notice can be given, unless the parties be jointly agreed upon a longer period, is fixed for the responsible editor at one year; for the sub-editor and collaborators employed in important work as well as for all collaborators on the permanent staff who have been employed for more than five years, at six months and for all other employes, at three months."

The countries which are listed as having no press laws include the rather incongruous group of Abyssinia, Argentina, Mexico and the United States. In this country it is said there are neither Federal or State Laws dealing specifically with the press (though recent legislation have shown designs in that direction). The issues which might arise are covered by the common law concerning civil and criminal libel, slander, and the use of the mails, being similar to British practice

HOUSTON DAILY'S SKYSCRAPER

Handsome 22-story downtown office building of the Houston Post-Dispatch recently completed. The classified and national advertising departments of the paper occupy the lobby and the second floor, while KPRC, the daily's broadcasting station is housed on the 22nd floor. The rest of the building is devoted to office space. R. S. Sterling is chairman of the board and publisher of the Post-Dispatch.

The Classified Leadership Of the Detroit News

Is An Index to Its Effectiveness in Every Other Type of Advertising

IN its own field, The Detroit News has for years been the recognized classified advertising medium, carrying regularly more of this type of advertising than all other Detroit newspapers combined.

During 1925 The News printed 1,486,173 separate classified advertisements, 825,000 more than the next medium and led also overwhelmingly in classified linage with 7,808,584 lines published — a lead of 2,936,262 lines over any other newspaper.

Classified advertising depending neither on type display, art or position for compelling attention is one of the best measures of advertising effectiveness available.

Since classified advertising must make direct returns without these aids the medium itself and the interest readers have in it must do all the work.

In Detroit that medium is The News which now has a week day circulation of more than 320,000 and a Sunday circulation of more than 350,000, covering its territory more thoroughly than any other newspaper in any other city of Detroit's size or larger.

That the classified leadership of The News is a capable barometer of advertising effectiveness is substantially established by the enormous total advertising volume of The Detroit News during 1925 in all classifications which exceeded 33,600,000 lines, leading all other large metropolitan newspapers.

How The Detroit News Leads In Classified Advertising in Detroit

Detroit News Number of Ads -	1,486,173
Second Medium Number of Ads -	661,044
News Lead - - - - - - -	825,126

The News' lead of 2,936,262 lines in volume of classified advertising was made despite the fact that it sells no white space and allows no type larger than agate in these columns.

1926 SEEN AS GREATEST ADVERTISING YEAR FOR NEWSPAPERS

R. S. Kellogg of News Print Bureau and James O'Shaughnessy of Four A's Cite Facts and Figures for Bullish Prediction

NEWSPAPERS of the United States entered spring this year in the healthiest and most prosperous condition since the war. All available current figures, charts and graphs indicate without quibble that the press of the nation stands in an enviable position.

One authority for this optimistic diagnosis is Royal S. Kellogg, secretary of the News Print Service Bureau, who is in closest possible touch with the paper situation, always a reliable index of publisher prosperity. Another is James O'Shaughnessy, executive secretary of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, an organization handling the accounts of approximately 5,000 different advertisers.

Both base their bullish predictions partially on the fact that last year there was an increase of 7 per cent in the advertising placed in all media over 1924. But both point to more current proofs of a fair weather springtime in the publishing field.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy predicted more advertising in newspapers this year than last, paying splendid tribute to the power of this particular medium.

Mr. Kellogg, in addition to watching the newsprint market, which he pronounces in unusually fine condition, prepares for bureau members each month a graphic summary of business conditions. Charts for the first two months of this year now ready furnish indications of a spring upswing.

"We haven't entered any boom period," he said. "There has been just enough recession in business to forestall any such unhealthy or abnormal state of affairs."

The charts show that the total liabilities in business failures in the United States for the first two months of 1926 were 54 per cent less than in 1924, and 7 per cent less than last year.

The value of merchandise imports of the United States was 28 per cent higher for the two months than two years ago and 20 per cent higher than 1925. American commodity prices stand 5 per cent less than last year.

Other index percentages show production of pig iron to have been 2 per cent more during January and February this year than 1924 and 6 per cent less than last year. Unfilled steel tonnage is 14 per cent less than it was in January and February of 1925.

More paper is being produced today than ever before in the history of this continent, Mr. Kellogg pointed out. The United States mills made 11 per cent more newsprint in the first two months of 1926 than in the same period in 1925 and the Canadians mills made 16 per cent more than in the first two months of 1925. The combined production of the United States and Canadian mills in the first two months of this year was 13 per cent more than last. Production in the United States in February amounted to 129,622 tons and shipments 128,635 tons. Production in Canada amounted to 135,663 tons and shipments to 135,505 tons.

A sign of present healthy newspaper conditions is the fact that so far the mills are finding a ready market for this increased supply of newsprint, according to Mr. Kellogg.

A chart issued this month by the News Print Service Bureau shows that the advertising linage in newspapers for the two months of this year was 8 per cent more than it was in 1925 in the corresponding period and 7 per cent more than in 1924.

The bureau also keeps up to date a chart showing the average number of pages printed each month, covering 65 newspapers in 23 cities with a circulation daily of 12,974,000 copies and Sunday of 11,825,000 copies.

During February these Sunday papers averaged 111 pages each week, compared with 108 pages in 1925. The dailies ran an average of 29 pages against 28 during the same month last year.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy asserted he was in possession of figures warranting the safe prediction that 1926 would be the "biggest year for advertising in history."

"Advertising operations," he said in an interview, "have reached such a degree of stabilization that no extravagant figures are needed in support of the prediction that this year will show a substantial increase over last.

"We have a built up advertising business to deal with today. It is not a speculative volume nor an adventurous volume. It is volume which stands on the record of past performances.

"Newspapers get more than the magazines of increased business. That has held true substantially for three years now. And I do not say it didn't previously also.

"Advertising space in the newspapers is a better buy today than it ever was before. The newspaper publishers have improved their product remarkably.

"Advertising agencies buy space more scientifically than they ever did before. There is less money lost on the purchase of newspaper space by intelligent advertisers in the course of a year than is lost in any other staple commodity in which money is invested. That's how sound newspaper space is to the advertiser today.

"People generally fail to realize the tremendous revolution that has taken place in the newspaper business of the United States in the last few years. There has been an improvement of every essential element of the newspaper that concerns the public, which is summed up in the improved net worth of the individual newspaper property."

Mr. O'Shaughnessy was asked if advertising would ever reach a saturation point.

"That expression 'saturation point' is a misnomer as far as advertising is concerned," he replied. "Advertising will never reach a saturation point, or in other words not until the human mind has turned into pure mineral matter. People steadily increase in vision as the growth and refinements of civilization continue.

"And also, it must be remembered, that there are still many millions of dollars annually employed in promotion efforts for which advertising may be economically substituted."

JUDGE POSTPONES HEARING

Madison Daily's Fight to Print Court Proceedings Delayed

Action on the petition of the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times to have dissolved an injunction against it from printing any of the evidence given at a recent court hearing in Madison was indefinitely postponed Friday by Judge A. C. Hoppmann, of the Dane county circuit court, the same judge who issued the original injunction.

The issues raised by the application of the Capital Times Company and William T. Evjue, editor, in the plea for a dissolution of the injunction "are too far reaching and of too great public interest to be decided without full deliberation," Judge Hoppmann declared in his statement postponing action.

The petition was a step in a legal battle of the newspaper to end judicial secrecy in Wisconsin as exemplified in private court proceedings and measures to prohibit a newspaper from publishing testimony of court cases. It followed the demand of attorneys for the slayer of a Madison policeman to have the editor of the Capital Times cited for contempt on the ground that editorials he had written excited prejudice against the slayer.

COAST GROUP DEFINES AGENCY STANDARDS

Southern California Editors to Establish an Approved Agency List to Protect Member Papers

In line with its policy of protecting member papers the Southern California Editorial Association, through a committee, has been working out a plan to guard against southern California publishers being the victims of unscrupulous advertising agencies, and in this work the association has been rendered the fullest support by the California Advertising Service Association.

Several preliminary meetings have been held by the committee appointed to work out the details of the plan to protect the publishers and from these has come the recommendation that some method be developed by which recognition and credit service on agencies be employed, patterned after the American Newspaper Publishers Association, and the Southern Newspaper Publishers Association.

It is purposed to draw up a definite set of standards for the advertising agencies, and that such agencies meeting these standards be recognized by the Southern California Editorial Association. A list of these agencies would be prepared and sent to all member papers for ready reference.

The basis for agency recognition, as recommended by the committee, is as follows:

First: That all of the present agencies that have been in business for at least two years and have given satisfactory service to the publishers, and whose financial statement is satisfactory to the association, be given immediate recognition as a matter of form.

Second: That future agencies be required to conform to the following standards:

a—Maintain an office separate and distinct from an advertising department of advertiser.

b—to have at least two active accounts with commissions grossing at least $3,000 per year.

c—To have been in business at least two years handling at least two accounts on a contractor fee basis. If on fee basis fee to be at least 15 per cent of gross billing.

d—To have had at least four years' experience in the advertising profession. If the applicant is a college graduate and has taken work in college along business and advertising lines, this should be sufficient to make a deduction of two years from the experience requirement.

e—To be able to furnish three references in the advertising profession. These references to profess a knowledge of honesty, thrift and capability.

f—That applicant shall agree to maintain card rates.

g—To be able to submit to the Southern California Editorial Association a statement of assets and liabilities showing current assets 2½ times current liabilities.

h—That satisfactory proof of all above requisites be supplied to the Southern California Editorial Association.

MOSES COMMITTEE TO RESUME HEARINGS ON POSTAL RATES MARCH 30

Permanent Non-Partisan Commission to Take Charge Gains Favor in Congress—Action Unlikely at This Session

By BART CAMPBELL

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25.—Hearings will be resumed March 30 by the Joint Congressional Postal Commission created by Congress to investigate postal conditions and plan a permanent postal rate structure.

Every opportunity will be afforded all of those interested in the postal situation to be heard again, Senator George H. Moses, chairman of the commission, told EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

Mr. Moses replied briefly this week to the demand of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and other organizations for immediate action upon postal rates. He called the commission together to review the situation. It was decided that spokesmen for the newspaper and other interests should again be given a day in court. After further testimony is taken the commission will endeavor to agree upon an early program.

The commission is hopelessly divided as to how revision of postal rates may be approached so as to insure favorable action by a majority of the Senate and House. The idea that postal rates should be placed in sole charge of a permanent, non-partisan, non-Congressional commission, similar to the I. C. C., is unquestionably gaining ground in Congress.

Whether the present drive to secure postal legislation at this session will succeed is problematical. The opinion is prevalent in some Congressional quarters that the whole subject will be thrown into the next session. Representatives of the publishing interests are expected to continue to oppose further delay, if only by reminding certain Senators and Congressmen that as candidates for re-election this year it would be poor politics for them to side-step the postal issue.

A great deal may depend, however, upon the outcome of the hearings scheduled to begin on Tuesday, March 30.

BLOOM PROMOTED

N. Y. Mirror Circulation Manager Also Directing American Sales

A change in the Hearst organization this week placed Ben W. Bloom in charge of circulation of both the New York American and the Daily Mirror. Mr. Bloom came to New York about four years ago as manager of circulation for the American. Last June he was transferred to the Daily Mirror.

Al G. Williams, circulation director of the San Francisco Examiner, who has been temporarily in charge of circulation for the American for the past six months, has returned to San Francisco. Bloom now makes his headquarters at the American. He was formerly with the Chicago American and later with the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. Williams' friends and associates in New York gave him a farewell dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria Thursday night and presented him with a watch.

THREE COPS ARRESTED FOR PASSAIC ATTACK

Charged With Atrocious Assault by McEvilly, Daily News Cameraman Who Was Badly Beaten in March 18 Riot

Three Passaic policemen, arrested on charges of atrocious assault and battery on Martin J. McEvilly, staff photographer of the New York Daily News, were arraigned before Police Judge William B. Davidson of Passaic, on March 22 and, waiving examination, were released on their own recognizance for a Grand Jury hearing March 29.

MARTIN MCEVILLY

The trio arrested were John Van Hoven, Tunis Van Gulick, and Michael Wynne.

Harry H. Van Aken, of Van Aken & Dewitt, counsel for the Daily News, was in court with McEvilly and witnesses prepared to give testimony.

Last Thursday, March 18, McEvilly had been set upon by three policemen during a Passaic strike riot, had been badly beaten, and his camera was smashed.

On the following day Mr. Van Aken obtained three John Doe warrants and with McEvilly and witnesses went to where the strikers were on parade and picked out Van Gulick, Van Hoven, and Wynne by their shield numbers.

After their arraignment Monday, Mr. Van Aken visited Abram Preiskel, Passaic's commisioner of public safety, reminding him he had promised to suspend any policeman who raised a hand against New York reporters or photographers.

"Have you suspended these three policemen arrested today?" he asked.

"No," Preiskel replied.

"Are you going to?" the lawyer persisted.

"Not until it is proved to me that they were guilty," Preiskel said.

Mr. Van Aken then demanded their suspension, stating it was the duty of police to protect newspaper men when they were properly and peacefully performing their duties. He also demanded that the News be reimbursed for its smashed cameras.

"Give me a couple of days to think it over," replied the commissioner.

"Passaic police trampled on the First Amendment of our Constitution, guaranteeing freedom of the press," Mr. Van Aken declared in a subsequent interview with EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "Our forefathers in their wisdom saw that this guarantee was necessary. It has always been looked upon as one of the most essential clauses in our Bill of Rights.

"It is the particularly serious duty of police officers to protect newspaper men from violence, when performing their regular duties peacefully and exercising a right guaranteed them under the Constitution."

Last Friday Passaic police began issuing special police cards to all cameramen and newspaper men, promising them complete protection in the future.

When attacked on March 18, McEvilly was asked to show his credentials and complied. Noting he represented a New York picture paper the policemen chased him into a field where they smashed his camera.

In a resolution requesting an investigation of the textile workers' strike by the Senate Committee on Manufacturers, introduced March 20, Senator LaFollette, Republican, said:

"Thousands of American citizens are being denied their rights under the Constitution of the United States of public assemblage, free speech and free press in that scores of brutal assaults have been and are being made on peaceable citizens including workers in the mills, representatives of newspapers, and local merchants and business men.

"Public officials are in the employ of mill owners, and public peace officers are arbitrarily refusing to enforce the ordinances of cities and statutes of the State for the protection of its citizens."

The reporters are in constant fear.

ALERT CARRIERS CAN ADD OUT-OF-TOWN READERS WITHOUT PREMIUM OFFERS

Proper Handling of Boys by Traveling Representative Biggest Factor, Says Circulator—Suggests Frequent Letters to Non-Readers

By SIDNEY D. LONG

Circulation Manager, Wichita Eagle

TO get the carriers in outside towns to get subscriptions without prizes and premiums is, after all, the real circulation manager's duty.

S. D. Long

In order to carry out this task, it is first necessary to have the right kind of carriers—in fact the best possible carriers. If it is a one carrier town, the traveling agent should use the utmost care in selecting the carrier.

The procuring of new carriers dates back farther than the telegraphed resignation of the carrier who has had the route and the rushing in of a traveling representative hurriedly to procure somebody to take the route, fearing that he will not be able to deliver the papers. Upon each visit in the town the traveling representative should get acquainted with other boys in the town; should talk up the route business among influential folks who might know boys. One of the unhappy features in outside towns in reference to newspaper delivering is the fact that very few people in the town realize the importance of newspaper delivering to boys who want to earn their way through school.

Every town has its ambitious boys. Every town has its boys who wish they would have a newspaper route. The traveling representative visiting these towns should mingle with the boys, get acquainted with them and find boys who want a route, talk to men who are interested in boys and who would keep their eye on a boy or two who might want a route. None of this is done to undermine the boy who has the route. It is done to make his route more valuable and the newspaper business in that town more sought after and more valuable. Every carrier should have a substitute who knows his route thoroughly and who wants the route when he quits. If there is a substitute waiting for the route and there are other boys in the town interested in having a route to earn their way through school, your regular carrier feels a greater importance in his own route and will listen more to the urgency of the circulation department in giving good service and building up his route.

When the representative is in town, have him go out with the boy and help him make his delinquent collections and impress upon the folks who are delinquent in their payments that this boy has to pay his bill whether they pay him or not and all the money they fail to pay him is lost by the boy. If the boy is falling down in his collections, stay in the town with him long enough to find out what is the trouble and then don't condemn, but help the boy. He is your representative. He is your hope in that town.

The same thing is true in reference to procuring new subscribers. Never allow your traveling representative to get into the attitude of procuring poor subscribers for a carrier. I think a lot of the traveling representatives should be fired rather than the carriers. The traveling representative is a man and should have deep enough respect for the office at least never to get a poor subscriber or bad list of subscribers for a boy carrier in an outside town.

The representative should get hold of the boy after school and take him with him on his soliciting trip about the town. It will help the boy to listen to the traveling representative solicit for new subscribers; it will teach him how to get new subscribers and it will teach him the value of new subscribers after he gets them. The party at the door will be impressed by the fact that the boy is with the traveling representative and that this boy wants the subscribers and needs the subscribers to earn his way through school.

A list should be procured of the non-subscribers in the outside towns. A letter should be prepared by the boy through the assistance of the traveling representative and that letter arranged in the newspaper office by mimeograph, etc. and signed by the boy and mailed out to the non-subscribers in the town. Three of these a month are very valuable.

Before the traveling representative leaves town, he should telephone nearly everybody who has a phone and tell them that he is calling them on account of this boy who has the route and that in order to help him build up the route that he, the representative, wants them to take the paper. Incidentally, of course, he will tell them the value of the newspaper.

Don't forget that your local tie-up is the boy and never forget to use the good reputation of your boy carrier in soliciting.

One of the stumbling blocks in the outside town with the carrier is the fact that he is allowed to get behind with his bill and then the traveling representative is sent there to raise a row with the boy. This is bad business. Stick with the boy and build him up so that he will be successful in his collections and in his solicitations and he will not get to the stage that he owes a bill but that he is always at the stage of paying his bill and being a good solicitor. This is entirely up to the traveling representative who is in the field and of course to the circulation manager who is the director over all. The circulation manager should keep in close touch with the boys in the outside towns. He should write them not less than once a month a friendly letter, perhaps at times putting phrases in that are kind but firm. Many a boy has fallen down in an outside town through the lack of having somebody to look to and to please when he gets a new subscriber or two, or when he sends in an increase.

In the above I have used as the example the outside town with the one carrier. The principle is the same where you have the agent and he has a number of boys under him. The agent should be constantly worked with as I have described with the boy above. His route will be built up. It will become more valuable.

The routes in the outside towns can be run and built up without prizes or premiums. It perhaps is not the quickest or flashiest way but can be done and the results are substantial.

CAMERAMAN OUTWITS CROWD

Slips Plates to a Boy and Gives Blanks to Belligerent Foes

After a spirited battle in the Senate chamber of the Virginia legislature, March 10, Mitchell Elkins, cameraman for the Richmond Times-Dispatch saved two flashlight plates showing Senator Alfred C. Smith surrounded by friends just after the Senate in night session had voted to expel him from that body.

As the vote to expel was announced Elkins let off his flashes. He was immediately surrounded by an angry crowd of Smith supporters who demanded the plates. Elkins fought his way to a stairs, and in the excitement was able to slip the plates to a boy who had been stationed there. The latter rushed them to the newspaper. Elkins then "surrendered" two plates, both blanks, to the belligerent Smith supporters, and they were promptly smashed.

The Smith expulsion fight has been big news in Virginia and the vote March 10, was the climax of the story.

Elkins is a former New York Mirror photographer. Arrangements for covering the story were made by Ernest Pollard, managing editor of the Times-Dispatch.

The Post-Dispatch Holds Want-Ad Supremacy in St. Louis

The True Index of a Newspaper's Value as an Advertising Medium and Its Popularity in Its Home City Invariably Is Its Volume of Want Advertising.

This chart illustrates the proportion of want-ad advertising carried by each of the St. Louis newspapers during 1925. Each division within the circle shows the percentage of the total published by each newspaper.

For almost a quarter of a century, year after year, without exception, the Post-Dispatch has been the people's popular classified advertising medium in St. Louis.

The Post-Dispatch has no single competitor in classified lineage comparisons in its field. . .The supremacy of the Post-Dispatch is based upon comparisons with the second, third and fourth newspapers combined!

In the count of separate advertisements, the same one-to-three comparisons are necessary—the Post-Dispatch excess over the three others during 1925 having been almost a quarter of a million individual classified advertisements.

Measured by the infallible classified standard, the medium of surest results in St. Louis is the Post-Dispatch.

The Sunday Post-Dispatch has over 100,000 more paid circulation than the only other St. Louis Sunday newspaper.

The Daily Post-Dispatch has over 38,000 more City Circulation than the morning newspaper — over 27,000 more than both other evening newspapers combined.

MOTOR ADVERTISING IN NEWSPAPERS WILL CONTINUE HEAVY

Competition Keener Than Ever, for Summer Sales as Show Season Ends and Larger Space Copy Figures in Many Schedules

DETROIT, March 22.—With the end of the motor show season, the men in the factories are beginning to figure out production schedules for the next few months and assemble the loose ends. Few people realize the endless lot of work that is piled up during the show season—between January 1 and March 15. With exhibitions in all the larger cities, cars and chassis must be routed from the Atlantic to the Pacific and sometimes back again, then to the Canadian border and again to the Gulf of Mexico. For the sales department there is a great deal of correspondence. Thousands of miles are traveled by factory executives. Advertising departments are swamped.

It was with a sigh of relief that the factory heads saw St. Patrick's day nearing. It meant a celebration all their own. That date meant the Boston show was over, and not another big show in sight. Boston officially ends the season.

Today on the desks of sales managers in every automobile plant in Detroit—and undoubtedly in plants in other cities—there are enough orders to keep the factories at 100 per cent production for another two months at the least. But it is not the orders for April delivery that mean anything. What the officials want to see is a steady stream of orders going into the summer and beyond.

Shows in the Middle West and beyond produced more orders than in 1925, but New England this year did not as an entirety pour out a lavish stream of paper signed on the dotted line. There were various shows in that territory ending with Boston, but sales were not very large.

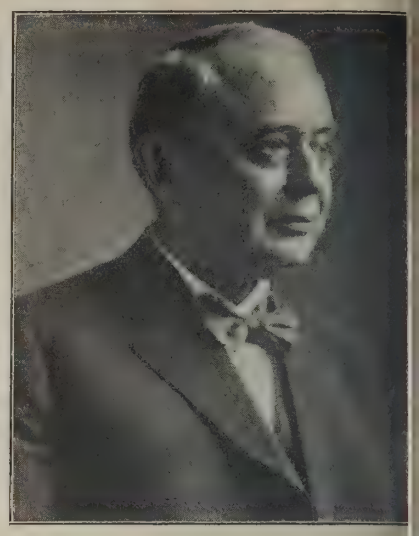
One of the big factory men here received a report that while some cars in the Boston show that exceeded last year's sales by 80, 90, and 100 per cent, many others fell off as much as 50 per cent. That leveled the average. Because there was a falling off in February in New England, due to storms, dealers had expected the show to produce a larger amount of sales than usual. Its failure to do so puzzles the factory men. Generally, New England is considered a barometer. When it begins to slow down, it is understood to mean that conditions are a bit warped and the wave of inaction will reach the Middle West in about three months and the Pacific Coast six months later.

Checking up on their expenditures, factory officials find that generally for the first three months of 1926, they have doubled their advertising appropriations, due to going heavy in show cities. And the big schedules are not exhausted yet. There is such keen competition going on that a message on some one point that might turn minds toward certain cars is hurried into the newspapers for quick results. It is necessary. The copy is large enough to get prominence—full pages are no longer a six months' wonder in advertising departments.

There is little doubt in the minds of the manufacturers that the big newspaper campaigns have been largely responsible for the heavy wave of buying which swept the country in January and February. There was a certain enthusiasm as a result of the shows. Just how lasting it will be remains to be seen. Manufacturers are now checking up on Pittsburgh where no big show was held this year in one building, the dealers having "show week" in their salesrooms. If this was effective and more economical than a show week at a big building with all its ramifications such as luncheons, dinners, etc., it may have an effect on shows in other cities.

Some of the older men in the industry who go back to the days when political campaigns meant shouldering a torchlight and wearing a colorful costume are watching the shaping up of the Congressional battle this Fall. To some of them it does not look any too cheerful—that is those who are backers of the present administration. If the World Court opponents succeed in catapulting a few Senators out of their seats, so that the administration loses control to a coalition, it will not please motor makers who have irons in the Wall street fire. They are wondering also if the recent shaking-down of the financial stock tree is a barometer of cloudy Fall conditions. Last year's great motor earnings sent the stocks to new high prices, but many of the executives are sobered down now and are beginning to be ready to shift their feet from accelerator to brakes.

They are watching each other's financial statements for the first quarter to get the true bearing on conditions. Has the big volume of production meant greater earnings? Or did it involve shrinkages? One glance to these men will tell them what they want to know. Whatever happens, stocks of cars must not be allowed to pile up either here or in the warehouses much after the middle of April. To move them every means must be resorted to and that means advertising. In strategic points there are today many cars stored, held by factories which would not overload the dealers, and awaiting the Spring demand. Other factories have been sending specified allotments each month to dealers. They are getting down to regular percentages now. The Willys-Overland Company, for example, expects its dealers to sell seven per cent of the cars in each specified territory. Studebaker figures that in its own class some 21 per cent of the sales should be theirs. Others are working out similar plans. Dealer organizations are being changed where men or firms refuse to sign up for allotted amounts.



There is a surge of optimism floating about Detroit today. It augurs well, of course; but underneath is a current of conservatism—not pessimism—which will leaven it. That is needed. The slump a few years ago is still too vivid to be forgotten. The motor factories today can slow down after the first six months, and go along so that earnings based on both 1925 and 1926 would show a good profit so large were the totals a year ago. It was this large surplus in 1925 that encouraged the expansion in advertising for 1926. Schedules will run pretty true to form until Summer, and it may be necessary to inject extra supplementary schedules in between then and Fall to keep cars moving into the hands of purchasers. Whatever curtailing is done after July 1 should not affect advertising in the newspapers to any great extent.

Their first three months' totals have been correspondingly large, keeping pace with motor car output.

The picture of late Summer and Fall sales can be sketched in another six or eight weeks. It will all revolve around the stock of used cars. Unless the dealers move at least 60 to 75 per cent of them without suffering a loss there will be a stopper in the neck of the new car bottle.

"Classified Guarantees Circulation."—R. A. Henderson

CLASSIFIED advertising was this week called a newspaper's best builder and retainer of circulation by R. A. Henderson, London business representative of the Sydney (Australia) Morning Herald, who is visiting New York.

The Morning Herald, Mr. Henderson said in an interview with EDITOR & PUBLISHER, devotes an average of 70 per cent of its daily space to classified advertisments, strictly regulated, and has found the practice pays big dividends, despite the fact it is sold at a rate 25 per cent less than display copy.

"We carry display advertising, of course," Mr. Henderson said, "but we really prefer classified, because we believe the latter guarantees us steady circulation. in the 96 years the Herald has been publishing, we have educated our readers to look for their advertising news in our carefully classified columns. A reader interest and reader confidence has thus been created with the result that this type of advertisement is now being used in Sydney by department stores, drug stores, drapery shops, hotels and many other advertisers who in most cities use larger copy.

"We will not accept display copy under 12 inches double column and in multiples of this size. It is our rule also not to print display advertisements on the same page as classified, to prevent the latter from being overshadowed.

"What has been the result? Our paper has kept its net sales steady. Our circulation never swings sharply up or down as I understand newspaper circulations in this country frequently do.

"Our experience has been that our paper is often purchased for its classified advertising. This is particularly true because of the advertising news printed in paid classified space of fashions, of births, marriages, and deaths.

"There is a saying in Sydney that a person is not born unless a statement of the fact is published in a Herald classified advertisement, he is not married unless his friends are informed through the classified columns, and he certainly is not dead, unless a classified advertisement records it."

Mr. Henderson said the secret of classified success lay in the building up of real reader confidence through strict censorship, the availability of classified agents, and careful and consistent classification of the various advertisements.

"We have a very strict censorship rule in force to protect our readers against misleading classified ads," he asserted. "We refuse to accept mail order advertisements until we are satisfied that the goods advertised are absolutely all right. We also will not advertise any cure-alls. In a 'business for sale' item, for instance, if there is any shadow of doubt in regard to it, we submit our copy to the police for investigation. In the case of a drug advertisement, we purchase a sample of the product, and send it to the government health department for analysis. If the health department reports unfavorably, we refuse to publish the advertisement in our columns."

Of utmost importance in the handling of classified copy, Mr. Henderson believes, is the practice of using the same pages daily for the same classifications. Thus each day page one of the Herald is filled solidly with shipping classified advertisements; page two invariably carries fashion copy exclusively; amusement advertisements will always be found on page three, positions vacant and situations vacant are on the last and next to last pages; and marriages, deaths, and births are consistently placed opposite the leader page.

"A reader can turn to what he wants in our paper blindfolded," Mr. Henderson said.

The availability of classified agents is also a necessary point in building up and maintaining classified custom, according to Mr. Henderson.

"In addition to the usual telephone facilities, the agents who sell our paper also accept classified advertisements, for which they are paid a commission. The entire territory served by the Herald is divided up into small blocks, the franchises to which are owned to Herald agents. These agents, while owning the franchises, may be replaced by our management if their work proves unsatisfactory.

"We keep in constant touch with them and they with us. They are instructed to mail in their classified copy if there is time, but otherwise, in order to make an edition, to use the telegraph."

The Herald, Mr. Henderson said, is now building a new plant, which when completed, will stand among the leaders of the world. It was started three years ago and is still in the process of construction. Before work began the general manager spent a year traveling in various countries seeking out all details of newspaper building, to incorporate them into the Herald's plant.

Mr. Henderson started as a "cadet journalist" for the Sydney Herald 11 years ago, and subsequently became what is called there "government roundsman," corresponding to political editorship in this country. In May 1923, he transferred to the business side of the paper, and, after a visit to this country, took over control of the Herald's London office.

REPORTER AND COP CLASH

Former Loses Case and Another Pays $10 for Obstructing Firemen

Dissatisfaction of London, Ont., newspapermen with certain officials and members of the police department culminated in a clash at an early morning fire recently. In the two police court actions which followed, Norman A. Campbell, night reporter of the Advertiser was fined $10 for obstructing firemen, while Constable Glidden was dismissed on a charge of common assault, laid by Emmet E. Kelleher, assistant night editor of the Advertiser.

While deploring the lack of harmony between reporters and the police, an editorial in the Advertiser championed the actions of the two members of the staff involved in the fracas.

Campbell went inside the fire lines at the blaze to converse with Chief Aitken when he was arrested by P. C. Glidden, who claimed the reporter had been warned to keep back.

After Campbell's arrest, Kelleher, and Charles March, night reporter of the Free Press, went to police headquarters. Kelleher's charge that he was violently ejected from the station was corroborated by March on the witness stand.

Magistrate A. H. M. Graydon, who tried the obstruction case, declined to act in the assault case, Deputy Magistrate Gladman rendering the decision in favor of the policeman. In the opinion of the court, Kelleher had not used the best of judgment in going to police headquarters after Campbell's arrest.

Los Angeles Circulation Test

Local Los Angeles advertisers forever keep in mind that home-delivered circulation counts double. They know that the city, due to its swift growth, contains an extremely large percentage of newcomers, and that these new arrivals exert no shopping influence on the community whatever. Unaccustomed to the climate and fearful of purchasing things unsuited to local needs, they invariably consult with permanently-located friends, or, in the case of small purchases, buy whatever the dealer hands out.

Los Angeles is thus a market where home-dwellers decide for everybody, hence the necessity of "selling" this group. To ascertain the home-delivered coverage of local papers, business firms conduct frequent tests, not that there ever is a doubt as to which paper will rank first, since Los Angeles Times' leadership is overwhelming, but mediums supplementary to The Times may vary with the season, conditions, or politics.

In the most recent test, conducted during February, 1926, the Delco Light Company mailed out 400 return postals to people who had purchased their FRIGIDAIRES. The names of all six Los Angeles newspapers were printed, and customers asked to check those received at their homes. Out of the 129 households responding, 86% were subscribers of Los Angeles Times. The complete tabulation showed—

THESE IDEAS APPEALED TO RETAIL ADVERTISERS—AND THEY WORKED

"Diagram" Ads Used as Guides Through Department Store—Denver Merchant Started Automobile Controversy in His Copy

By PHILIP FRANCIS NOWLAN

THE Frank & Seder store in Detroit has had a great deal of success with the "diagram advertisement" in staging a special sale. The idea is a very simple one. It consists primarily of giving the floor plan of the store in the advertisement, with the locations of the various counters and the classes and sizes of merchandise the customer will find at each. There are three distinct advantages. The diagram gives the advertisement an unusual appearance and therefore attracts more than normal attention. It creates good will among consumers, who appreciate a common-sense and unusual arrangement for their convenience. It lessens confusion at the sale itself, making the task of directing customers to the proper counter a less burdensome one, and so speeding up the work that a given number of salespeople can wait on a larger number of patrons with less effort.

Officials of the store declare that the plan in some instances has made it possible to take care of twice as many customers in a given time as otherwise. They have noted that a surprisingly large number of women who come into the store actually have clipped these diagrams from the store's advertisement and use them as guides.

With big cards over the counters themselves, duplicating the information given in the diagram, it has been found that customers will wait on themselves to a large extent, and 40 salespeople, for instance, can sell more than 1,000 knit dresses or sweaters in a day.

Several stores in Clearfield, Pa., joined in the purchase of a page of advertising, with it staging a contest for youngsters on the basis that one of the best ways to attract the attention of parents is through the interests of their children.

The point of the plan was the award of prizes to the children who got out their boxes of paints and brushes and made the best jobs of coloring the illustrations in the advertisements.

The fundamental idea is not restricted to a contest in coloring advertisements. A puzzle interest of almost any sort could be substituted, or the old "tried and true" plan of an essay contest based on something in the advertisements. Nor is the idea one that necessarily would have to be applied by a number of stories in co-operation.

Innumerable variations of the scheme suggest themselves as you think of it.

Here's a thought to put in your tickler file until election rolls around. Broadly it is the opportunity for the retail merchant to attract some attention to his store by tying it up in some way with the election or with one or both of the opposing candidates without actually injecting himself or his store into politics. It is essentially a light-hearted idea. Form a little committee and wait upon one or both of the candidates with a gift of a hat, or a suit of clothes, or whatever the store may be selling, with the store's compliments. Then mention the incident in an ad, giving a detailed description of the merchandise. Or some chatter about the political situation, preferably but not necessarily illustrated with a humorous drawing, will in itself make an attention-compelling introduction to merchandise announcements. Such stores as Weber & Heilbroner's, Lord & Taylor's, Dobbs, and Ovington's in New York made good use of this sort of thing during the last Democratic national convention.

When a merchant is remodeling his store front, with consequent loss of window publicity, he should counterbalance this temporary loss by increased newspaper publicity. It was on this theory that the Fair Store, in Lexington, Ky., heavily increased its advertising space and also took occasion in its advertising to explain to the public just why it was remodeling its front; and staged a "remodeling sale."

The Kline ready-to-wear shop in Detroit considers that the most profitable advertising money it ever spent was $300 in prizes for the best letters from women telling why shopping at the store was a "profitable pleasure." More than 1,000 women replied in three days, giving the store ammunition for advertising copy that lasted a long time.

There is no question but that one of the best ways for a store to attract the attention of consumers is to ask them a question. When the Owl Drug Company in Los Angeles advertised prizes for the best opinions on bobbed hair, it received 14,626 replies. Incidentally the vote stood 10,255 to 4,371 for the "bobs."

And here's a snappier idea for those great open spaces of the West, where men are men, and speak more from the face out, reclining less on dignity.

Frederick W. Jefferay runs a clothing store in Denver. He figured he needed a new automobile, and that he might just as well "start something" in the process of selecting it. So he just mentioned the desire right along with his talks about clothing in his newspaper advertising, challenging the automobile agencies to tell him why he should buy what each had to offer. Most of them accepted the challenge in their own advertisements, which they addressed to him. There was a lot of good-nature "kidding," and Jefferay strung it out a long as he could. The publicity obtaine through this debate, carried on in ac vertising space, benefited the automobil agencies as well as Jefferay. It gav the public many a chuckle—and it cer tainly didn't hurt the sale of newspape space.

Brooklyn registered last year 25,052 new passenger cars.

Among all the evening newspapers in Greater New York, the Standard Union stood third for the years 1923, 1924 and 1925 in the amount carried in automobile display advertising.

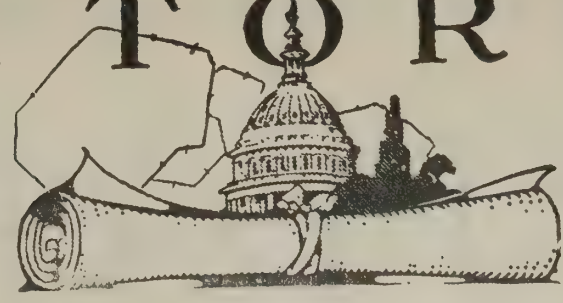
NEWSPAPER MEN'S WILLS

WHAT, if anything, does a millionaire newspaper proprietor owe, when he comes to making his will, to salaried employes who have loyally aided him to rear his journalistic enterprise? What does he owe to his institution?

The employes have been paid, presumably adequately, for their time. They risked no capital. They were free to stay or seek their fortunes elsewhere. A man who establishes a profitable business through the investment of money, faith in policies, enterprise, talent, work, is at liberty to make such disposition of his property at death as he may elect. It is wholly optional with him whether those who have assisted shall be remembered, whether his newspaper institution shall be perpetuated, or whether the business shall be put up on the block as might any other property and the proceeds be philanthropically dispersed. That is one view.



Another view is that the ordinary salary often does not and cannot compensate newspaper executives for the intense effort made in erecting a great newspaper over a long period of years. This is a peculiar business. A salaried executive is often much more in the attitude of partner than employe. Newspaper loyalties are of a quality not often found in other industries or professions. The business is sensitive, responsibilities great and ramified and no one man can carry the load on his own shoulders.

Assuming that a wealthy publisher cannot for any reason pass control to natural heirs, trained to succeed him, how shall he act in justice to his employes and to the institution of which they are a part? The problem has been strangely and variously met by prominent publishers. At the present time there are four conspicuous instances in the public view of publisher will-making. In the final analysis they illustrate two methods.

Consider the case of Frank A. Munsey. He, who had so ingeniously accumulated a huge stack of millions, seemed bewildered when it came to disposing of them at death. Except on the theory that Mr. Munsey sought to build a monument, his gift of practically his entire fortune to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, which he had never patronized and, so far as is known, had never even visited, is unexplainable. His great newspaper, magazine and commercial enterprises are to be sold, under his will, presumably to the highest bidder and the funds are to go to art. While one must appreciate this act as in favor of the general public, nevertheless the natural course of such an intense individual as Munsey would have been to endow, through loyal employes, since he had no suitable family successor, such a magnificent quasi-public institution as the New York Sun. Possibly the employes may succeed in buying the newspapers and periodicals and continue them in their course, but so far as Mr. Munsey was concerned he appeared willing to permit these properties to pass to any interest able to pay the price, thus to benefit an institution in another field.

Even more unexplainable is the case of Col. Nelson, a wholly different type of publisher. He also willed that trustees should sell the Kansas City Star and Kansas City Times, to raise a fund to purchase art as a stimulus for the cultural refinement of the people of Kansas City. Col. Nelson, of course, provided amply for the members of his family, but the Nelson fortune in the final analysis goes to the people in the form of art. This towering editor, who fought so nobly and so well for his city, seemed to forget his paper as a public institution whose power to serve the public good might a thousand times transcend that of an art institution. The employes of the Nelson newspapers have carried on since the death of the founder in his true spirit. The properties are to be sold. Col. Nelson might easily have arranged for their acquirement by the men whom he trained and whom he could trust to continue his policies. Again, in his case, there appears to have been no concern as to the future of the newspapers or those who did so much to bring them to their high position.

And, again, there is the case of Victor Lawson. The Chicago Daily News, under his will, was put into the hands of a single individual, a banker, to be sold as any other property might be sold, the fund to go to a Church and the Y. M. C. A. With Mr. Lawson, as with Mr. Munsey and Col. Nelson, there seemed to be no plan to perpetuate the ideals of the institution he built. However, if Mr. Lawson had lost interest in his own creation, a group of his loyal employes had not. They, headed by Walter A. Strong, purchased the property, assisted by local capitalists and merchants who also believed in Lawson policies. It was interesting to note that the first announcement that these employe-owners made was that the Lawson newspaper code would be perpetuated. It is known that other capable newspaper men were rival bidders for the property and in their hands the Daily News certainly would have been worthily conducted. But Mr. Lawson, zealous idealist in his day, willed that his newspaper institution should pass to the highest bidder.

I am the vine, ye are the branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing.—St. John, XV; 5.

The disposition that the late E. W. Scripps made of his estate contrasts perfectly with the cases of Munsey, Nelson and Lawson. Mr. Scripps, many years ago began to prepare for the day when he should die and to work for the perpetuation of his institution and the policies upon which it was founded. He trained his sons to succeed him, and for many years, shared profits with employes. Of four sons, three died. Last week, Robert P. Scripps, the surviving male heir, published to the readers of Scripps-Howard Newspapers that the death of the founder would, through his own foresight, occasion no change of policy, management or even ownership. Six years ago Mr. Scripps turned over to Robert P. Scripps and Roy W. Howard full editorial and managerial authority. Two years later he caused all of his newspaper and service organization stocks to be incorporated in the E. W. Scripps Company and executed an agreement whereby his son, as trustee, became owner of all of his stocks in the new company and assumed full responsibility for the conduct of the newspapers and allied properties.

"It was a fundamental idea with my father," Robert P. Scripps stated, "that a man of advanced years should not attempt to discharge personally all of his public and private duties right up to the day of his death but that he should organize for the future." In this respect, as in many others, Mr. Scripps was unique. He started profit-sharing with chief executives shortly after his newspaper became profitable. Latterly he created investment companies which made it possible for wage earners to become stockholders and, when the founder died, the house was perfectly in order and it was believed that at least 60 per cent of the ownership of his various companies had been distributed or was committed to the employes through the investment companies, while owner control and final responsibility was left vested in his son and Roy W. Howard. These two young men Mr. Scripps had trained as a master instructs his favorite students. The Scripps' will has not yet been read, but unquestionably it provides for the natural rights and needs of the family. Mr. Scripps' newspaper institution to him seemed, in a sense, to be a thing apart. If his son had not shown aptitude for journalism and marked ability to carry on, Mr. Scripps unquestionably would have provided for him as a member of his immediate family, but would have selected an employe to command the newspaper institution.

This is the contrast—yet who will say that Mr. Scripps was less public-spirited than those who willed that their newspapers should be sold and that the funds be given to strictly public institutions?

Why must metropolitan morning "lobster" editions go to press without proof-reading? Evening editors know how to railroad late stories and proof them, too.

MAKING BUDGETS

BUSINESS managers interested in the vital question of budgeting current expense should ge from the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company a booklet on the subject recently prepared by Henry Bruere, the third vice-president.

"Why," he asks, "is budgeting essential to efficien management of organized business?" and replies a follows: "It is because in an organization the in dividual members are inclined to be spiders, weavin webs about themselves, warily watching their ow little provinces lest some brother trespass upon it No chief executive can successfully overcome thi tendency, and by his personality or wisdom ade quately co-ordinate the thinking and activity of sev eral subordinate executives."

A symposium of budgeting experience in variou industries is presented. In the newspaper field th following succinct budget plan is described by E. J Ottaway, President of the Port Huron (Mich.) Times-Herald:

> The first of the year we take the total amount of business, both advertising and circulation, that we are likely to do for the ensuing year (figuring for safety about 10 per cent less than the preceding year), and on this total amount we base our budget, figuring to expend, as closely as possible, 85 per cent of our total income. The distribution among the various expense accounts by departments is based in general upon the Inland Daily Press Association cost results, and on this basis the amount each department is permitted to spend during the year is figured. At least four times during the year we determine whether our total volume of business is keeping up with our original estimate, and, if not, we aim to cut expenses pro rata in each department to fit the situation. For instance, if, during the first three months, business has fallen off $5,000, then we would figure that we were facing a decrease of $20,000 per year and would adjust our budget accordingly. Likewise, if business were on the increase, we would increase our budget estimates for each department.

An advertisement or a free publicity puff which taxes the credulity of the public damages the business concerned and also the newspaper which gives currency to the statement.

DESPERATE MEASURES

"WHO are you working for?" demanded Passaic, N. J., cop of the newspaper m who wore his credentials in plain view.

"New York Daily News," . . . bang, and camera was smashed to bits, plates exposed, reporter clubbed.

Twice during the progress of the textile strike the adjoining towns of Passaic and Clifton ne paper men and at least one girl reporter have the blows of uniformed police officials. Do you do the stories that these same police have been beat women strike pickets to provoke violence?

What do these occurrences mean? They m censorship of the press by a local government s servient to business interests. So, it has come to th

The social economic situation in those mills m be rotten to the core. They cannot bear the light a reporters' camera plate. The protected indus that gets into this kind of a war must be pr desperate. The business calls for investigation the federal authorities to its depth. The day has yet come, under the Stars and Stripes, when the c and the knout substitute for constitutional guarant If this strike is "communistic," which we have where seen proved, those who have met it with violence are Czaristic, and if we must select betw two evils our choice shall be the former, as it at l comes a little nearer to original principles of mocracy.

The stupid, blind, greed-crazed mill officials their Hessian mercenaries dressed up in the unifo of civic servants, have attempted to draw the cur over their brutality by clubbing newspaper men, they have succeeded in convincing the normal citi that the cause of the strike is just, whether it is or Hence, these outrages shall ultimately avenge th selves—the industry that inflicted them will through the nose. Again, all honor to the repor who took the abuse that the public might know.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

WILLIAM C. VAN CLEVE, owner and manager of the Moberly (Mo.) Daily Monitor-Index and founder of the Maryville (Mo.) Daily Democrat-Forum, early in life conceived a desire to learn printing. He began with a little 3x5 card press and outfit, and later acquired a larger hand press on which to do neighborhood job work.

W. C. Van Cleve

After finishing common schools, he worked his way through college, and upon being graduated, went back to printing as foreman and reporter of the La Grange (Mo.) Democrat, weekly. In 1891 he purchased an interest in the Moberly Democrat for $1,537, paying $37 in cash and giving notes for the balance, which he later paid. Eight years afterwards he sold this interest and after work on several Missouri papers, joined with James Todd in the consolidation of three newspapers into the Maryville Daily Democrat-Forum.

Then he spent a number of years as journal clerk in the House of Representatives at Washington and wrote the journals of the House.

In June 1919, he and Mr. Todd purchased the Moberly Daily Monitor and the Moberly Index and consolidated them into the Moberly Monitor-Index. The Monitor-Index absorbed the Moberly Daily Democrat in April 1925, and one month later the Democrat-Forum took over the Daily Tribune at Maryville. These are now the only papers in these cities.

Mr. Van Cleve has taken an active part in civic improvement and community welfare and for the past two years has been president of the Moberly Chamber of Commerce. He is also president of the Missouri Associated Dailies and active in other organizations.

David Karsner, of the New York Herald Tribune copy desk, has been transferred to the Sunday magazine department, as assistant to Arthur Folwell, Sunday editor.

Jerry Swinehart, feature writer, Palm Beach (Fla.) Post, has resigned to do publicity work.

Al Wagner, formerly of the Minneapolis Tribune and Fargo (N. D.) Forum, has joined the reportorial staff of the Milwaukee Sentinel.

Merrell J. Mitchel, late advertising manager of the Yankton (S. D.) Press

Two More Circulation-Building Features in Central Press Service

CONTINUING its policy of constantly improving its service without increasing the price, The Central Press Association has added two features of established merit to its complete and exclusive daily illustrated news and feature service.

Mrs. Florence Smith Vincent's talks to women, which have given the New York Evening Telegram an influential circulation among housewives, and an unique feature by Charles Hanson Towne, famous poet, critic and novelist, are now a part of the Central Press general service. Mrs. Vincent's talks are being released under the general title of "Living and Loving." Mr. Towne's feature, "Poems I Love," is an anthology of the best verse of all time, each release consisting of a poem with a brief introduction by Mr. Towne which will interest even those readers who do not care for verse.

The quality of Central Press news-pictures and sports is established. Central Press features are also 100 per cent, as a constantly increasing number of editors are willing to testify. Central Press' daily service is satisfying more than 400 newspapers.

Let us send you the service for four days without charge. We will not only send the proofs, but also all of the mats, so that you can give them a trial.

J. M. Cecil to Move From Richmond to New York Branch, Cecil, Barreto & Cecil, Inc.—John Sullivan Opens New York Business—Young & Rubicam to Move

J. M. CECIL, founder of Cecil, Barreto & Cecil, Inc., will move shortly from Richmond to New York to take charge of the rapidly increasing business of the New York branch of the agency.

Mr. Cecil, while keeping in contact with his old home, expects to maintain a residence in New York for the next two years.

John Sullivan, former secretary of the Association of National Advertisers, has opened an office at 1819 Broadway, New York, to carry on a business as marketing counsel.

Young & Rubicam, advertising agency which makes its headquarters in Philadelphia, will move its New York branch April 1 from 250 Park ave. to 285 Madison ave. The New York office will include the media, checking and accounting departments of the agency.

H. R. Mulvey, head of the H. R. Mulvey Advertising Service, is celebrating his second anniversary in business under his own name. Mr. Mulvey himself has been 22 years in the advertising business, starting in 1904 on the Cincinnati Post. Later he was connected with the Cincinnati Times-Star, and subsequently entered the agency field.

F. J. Fitzgerald, of Calkins & Holden, Inc., New York advertising agency, nas accepted the chairmanship of the Newspaper Advertising Committee in the forthcoming maintenance appeal of the Salvation Army for Greater New York. He will hold a luncheon meeting of his committee April 14 at the Hotel Roosevelt.

David A. Tynion, formerly with the Curtis Publishing Company, has joined the staff of the Z. L. Potter Company, Syracuse advertising agency.

Fred J. Suhr and Hugo Parton have joined Cowan, Dempsey & Dengler, Inc., New York advertising agency as partners. Both have been with the George Batten Company for the last six years.

The Andrews Advertising Corporation, Olean, N. Y., has been granted a charter by the Secretary of State to do a general advertising business. Capital of $75,000, consisting of $100 shares. The directors are Max Andrews, James P. Quigley, and J. E. McAuliffe.

Arthur K. Fox, formerly with the Detroit agency of William N. Albee & Co., has joined the Buchen Company, industrial agency, Chicago. Another addition to the staff of this agency is Leon L. Peterson, who has joined the copy department.

The Tiffany-Bayless Company, agency in the Hanna Building, Cleveland, has changed its name to the Bayless-Kerr Company. The officers and directors remain the same.

WITH THE GENERAL ADVERTISERS

Gerard B. Lambert Tells of Listerine's Advertising Record—American Gas Association Conducting National Campaign—East Leaves "Save-the-Surface" Group

GERARD B. LAMBERT, president of the Lambert Pharmacal Company, disclosed the advertising record of Listerine in newspaper advertisements this week, recording the sale of 190,624 shares of stock in the Lambert Company through Goldman, Sachs & Co., and Bond & Goodwin, Inc., New York bankers.

A letter, written by Mr. Lambert, and used as the text of the advertisement, follows in part:

"The company's advertising of Listerine has had an unusual record. Starting with practically no expenditure in 1921, each monthly increase in advertising has been met during that month by an increase in profit as great as the advertising increase and a substantial additional profit. The growth of our advertising expenditures is indicated by the fact that in 1925 our advertising expenses were about $2,100,000 and in 1926 they will exceed $3,000,000. The total monthly circulation of the media being employed at this time is certified by the Audit Bureau of Circulation at approximately 65,000,000. During the last four years we have spent over $4,400,000 in advertising."

The letter states that the company was founded 47 years ago. From 1921, when advertising on a large scale was first started, the total sales of each month have shown an increase over the sales of the same month of the previous year.

The American Gas Association, New York, announces it is conducting an intensive national advertising campaign to promote the use of gas for industrial purposes. Advertisements are appearing in 21 national trade papers and mats are being supplied to individual gas companies for use in local newspapers. The companies are being advised that the most effective way to use these newspaper advertisements is to "synchronize their publication with their appearance in the trade papers." A series of advertisements for six months, each copy in two sizes, three or five column width, have been prepared in mat form. Charles W. Person is secretary of the publicity and advertising section of the American Gas Association.

Verne Burnett, secretary of the Advertising Committee of General Motors Corporation, has been named chairman of the Committee on Relations With Newspaper Publishers of the Association of National Advertisers. Mr. Burnett's headquarters are in the General Motors Building, Detroit, Mich.

William R. McComb, manager of the development department of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, has been appointed to succeed Arthur M. East, for the past five years business manager of the Save-the-Surface Campaign, who has resigned effective April 1 to become vice-president and director of Home Owners Service Institute, Inc., New York.

Mr. McComb is a graduate engineer, in addition to being a graduate of the Harvard School of Business Administration. He has had experience in industrial development, market survey, and trade association work. The Save-the-Surface Campaign offices will be moved from Philadelphia to New York in July.

The Home Owners Service Institute is conducting a national model home demonstration campaign in the leading cities on behalf of the manufacturers of nationally advertised quality building materials. Mr. East will be associated with a group of men whose work will also consist of aiding various industries in organizing and financing co-operative merchandising campaigns, similar to the Save-the-Surface campaign.

Fred Rasmussen, secretary of the National Association of Ice Cream Manufacturers, has already announced that his association has retained Mr. East to organize the co-operative advertising work of the ice cream industry, which has pledged $260,000 for use during 1926. His offices will be located at 441 Lexington avenue, New York.

Paul Westphal, Inc., manufacturers of a hair tonic, won a suit in Supreme Court in New York this week against Paul Westphal, grandson and namesake of the originator of the product. The court ruled that Mr. Westphal and his associates had illegally appropriated the name "Westphal's" and had sought by advertising to destroy the property right of the plaintiff corporation.

What was said to be the first step toward a nation-wide laundry system was taken this week by the Associated Laundries of America, Inc., in the consolidation of 20 laundries in upper New York State cities.

These properties serve a population of 1,250,000 and the companies being merged include the Leahy, Westcott, Star, Ideal, Well-Done and American Linen Supply Company, all of Utica; Davis & Sweeney Loundry of Binghamton, Yale, Palace, Perfection Empire and Syracuse Laundries, all of Syracuse, and Mohn & Hunter, New Way and New Modern, all of Buffalo. Companies also are being acquired in Cortland, Corning, Elmira and other cities.

In practically every state in the Union some minor consolidations of laundries have taken place. Kansas City, Los Angeles, New Orleans and Cincinnati have recently figured in the merger movement. The laundry business has more than trebled in volume in the last ten years and statisticians say that only a tenth of the possible market has been exploited.

Bankers identified with the present merger declare there are now 200,000 persons engaged in the laundry business in this country, with a capital investment of about $250,000,000.

The White Sewing Machine Corporation, Cleveland, O., is celebrating its golden anniversary, telling the history of the company in newspaper advertising copy. The concern was established in 1876.

Dwight E. Libby, who recently resigned as advertising director of the Central Maine Power Company at Augusta, Me., has joined the advertising department of the Stetson Press, Boston.

Newspapers will be used in a campaign to be conducted by S. S. Stafford, Inc., New York, makers of Stafford inks, typewriter ribbons, etc. The account is handled by the Wales Advertising Company, New York.

Smith & Davis Manufacturing Company, St. Louis, manufacturers of bed springs, has started a newspaper campaign. The Chappelow Advertising Company, St. Louis, directs the account.

The Burroughs Adding Machine Company, Detroit, Mich., has appointed William C. Sproull as acting advertising manager. Mr. Sproull has been associated with the Burroughs Company for the past six years.

How Science Service Reports Earthquakes—Putnam and Wheeler Join to Sell Motion Picture Rights—Trekking Through Alaskan Wilds for Polar Story

ARRANGEMENTS for further extension of the co-operative earthquake reporting service of Science Service, which is under the direction of James Stokely of the staff, by the inclusion of new reporting seismological stations have been announced. This service, which has been in operation for more than a year, attempts to locate the exact epicenter of all moderately severe quakes. Eighteen seismologists at stations on this continent telegraph in code their records of disturbances to Science Service, which locates an epicenter and reports to client newspapers.

George Palmer Putnam, the publisher and owner of the Putnam Syndicate, and John N. Wheeler, president of the Bell Syndicate, Inc., have become associated in the sale of motion picture rights to literary works. Mr. Putnam and Mr. Wheeler lunched with Will Hays, president of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, Inc., last week, and received his approval of their plans. The motion pciture department of George Palmer Putnam, Inc., has been expanded. Associated with Mr. Putnam and Mr. Wheeler in the new co-operative enterprise will be George T. Bye, Allie Lowe Miles, and Richard Halliday.

William C. Lyon, formerly Seattle correspondent of the Consolidated Press Association, who is to obtain news of the Amundsen-Ellsworth, the Byrd and the French polar expeditions, is now trekking through Alaskan wilds to Point Barrow, where a wireless station is to be set up to send back stories to the New York Times, which, with associated newspapers, has purchased exclusive news rights of these three attempts to reach the North Pole. The stories are to be distributed to other newspapers through Current News Features, Inc.

A dispatch was published this week under a Tanana, Alaska, date-line, which concluded:

"We follow the Nome trail to Kaltag where we leave it and cut across the portage to Unalakleet, then turn north across the neck of Seward Peninsula and Kotzebue Sound, then up the Arctic Coast to our destination. The next wireless station is Ruby. At our present rate we will be there on Friday the twenty-sixth."

Final tabulation of the returns from 326 newspapers in all parts of the country which co-operated with NEA Service, Inc., in conduct of the nation-wide prohibition poll, showed a grand total of 1,747,630 votes cast. These votes were divided as follows: For retention of the prohibition law with strict enforcement, 330,779; for repeal of the prohibition law, 547,866; for modification of the law to allow the sale of wine and beer, 868,985.

In concluding the poll, NEA Service commented that the referendum, which was the largest ever held by newspapers in America, was "conducted in absolute fairness and with all the accuracy possible; and that neither NEA Service, which began it, nor the editors who carried it through, had any ulterior motive in conducting it."

The Metropolitan Newspaper Service announces short stories by Booth Tarkington, Ruth Comfort Mitchell, Herman B. Deutsch, Royal Brown, Shirley Seifert, Edward Hope, Arthur Train, and Vingie E. Roe.

International Newsreel and P. & A. Photos, Inc., used airplanes for fast time transmission of pictures to New York from Plymouth, Vt., in connection with the death of Col. John Coolidge.

Early last Thursday, R. Eugene Boyd, manager of the still photograph department of the former syndicate, engaged a plane to make a trip to Vermont. It reached Plymouth four hours after its departure from New York. With the story completely covered the airplane started back at noon Friday, arriving at Curtis Field, Garden City, at 2.50 o'clock the same afternoon.

The pictures were sent by radio to Chicago and the Far West, while another airplane took prints to Boston.

An airplane hired by P. & A., left Plymouth at 10.40 a. m. on Friday, and covered the 250 miles to Curtis Field in 2 hours and 40 minutes.

Both flying machines were delayed in Albany where landing skiis were replaced by wheels.

The title for the daily feature on sports syndicated by Current News Features, Inc., is "Where Are They Now?" William J. McNulty is the author of the feature. In each installment the present activities of one former athlete are discussed in humorous vein. A special art heading has been prepared in both single and two columns. Prior to free lancing, the writer of the feature was on New York, Boston, New London, Bridgeport, Conn., Chicago, etc., newspapers. He is the author of "The North Land," a novel published recently in Boston.

Cosmos Newspaper Syndicate, Inc., New York, will shortly distribute a series of six weekly articles under the heading "The Great Arctic Highway," by Vilhjalmur Stefansson. The series is described as explaining the possible results from this year of Arctic exploration through the air.

The weekly feature page of International Syndicate, Baltimore for April 4, is devoted to reproductions of famous paintings depicting the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ.

The Vogue fashion feature handled by the Conde Nast Newspaper Service has been changed to give one three-column, three two-column, and two one-column cuts each week.

"Character Close-Ups," is the title of a new offering ready for distribution by the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia. It runs six days a week in one-column mat, and contains material from chirology, physiognomy, and graphology. The contributor prefers to preserve his anonymity, the syndicate announced.

Barbara Winslow is writing the weekly fashion page issued by International Syndicate, Baltimore. The feature is illustrated with half-tones.

INDIANA TABLOID LAUNCHED

Indianapolis State Tribune, Weekly, Expects to Become Daily Soon

INDIANAPOLIS, March 25.—The Indiana State Tribune, Democratic tabloid weekly, made its first appearance March 21. Its publishers expect to make the paper a daily after the Primaries. The first number had 32 pages, 980 lines to page, with a magazine section and comics in colors, and sold for five cents a copy.

It is devoted to Democratic issues but uses features of general interest. The staff is composed of Henry L. Freking, organizer and manager; Howard Smith, editorial manager; Will F. Griffin, state editor; A. E. Thompson, sports; J. R. Walters, general political writer; Cora Bicknell, editor women's department.

The paper is in its own building and is the only Democratic paper published in Indianapolis. It is published by the Indiana State Tribune Company. In addition to city and state Democratic politics, the paper also prints articles along the same lines of nation-wide interest.

"WRITE PLAINLY, LET READERS ADD THE FRILLS"

"Fine Writing" Often a Smoke Screen to Hide Absence of Facts, Says Philip Kinsley, Veteran Chicago Tribune Reporter—Calls News Men the Life-blood of a Paper

By LUCILE BRIAN GILMORE

THE business of being a newspaper reporter, shorn of its glamour and its aura of excitement, is just a plain business, requiring perhaps, just a bit more level-headedness, a bit keener insight and a bit more of the fundamental rules of sportsmanship than the workaday world of dispensing calico, hides, automobiles or gospel.

That is the analysis of the news reporter drawn by a man whose entire experience is one of news reporting. One who is glad he's a news reporter, never wants to be anything else and who, after more than a score of years spent in chasing and presenting news, still holds the ideals of true journalism and believes that the world is coming into a realization of the value of a good news reporter—Philip Kinsley, of the staff of the Chicago Tribune.

Whether his judgment is sound may best be judged by his assignments in the "doom book" of the Tribune city desk Kinsley's first assignment was that of checking on casualties and pictures of the Iroquois theatre fire. Since then he has covered many notable stories—the Dayton evolution trial, the first National Aviation Meet at Los Angeles in 1910, the "back-to-nature" venture of Joe Knowles, Henry Ford's libel suit against the Tribune, Gen. Wood's administration of the Philippine Islands, the administrations and deaths of two presidents, Wilson and Harding, and many others.

Kinsley's experience in news writing has been obtained on two newspapers, the Tribune and the San Francisco Examiner, and on the Associated Press.

A few of the impressions gained during that time which are incorporated in his gospel of news writing are: "Nothing is so dead as yesterday's news, nothing is so important as the news of today, the 'city desk' is not the final judge of news but the public at large is. The news reporter is the one on whom a great responsibility rests and that responsibility must be discharged to the best of the reporter's knowledge, ingenuity and ability.

The reporter is the foundation and life-blood of the paper," Kinsley declares, "and around him is built all the huge structure devoted to presenting the day's news. The reporter has a strange code of ethics, but although strange, it is iron-clad. He may steal a story without a moment's warning, but he will never break a confidence to get one. He may wink at a story for the sake of a friend, but will go through fire to get and print a story which he has been offered a bribe to forget.

"He may help a wayward beaten soul, broken on the wheel of the world, but the smiling hypocrite is his legitimate prey. Just think what might happen in the courtrooms, council chambers and legislative bodies were it not for this straight-steering news-hound who listens to everyone and then tells the truth as nearly as his trained mind is able to see it.

"He is given a clean sheet of paper and told to write on it. He should be conscious that his words will be read by, and may influence the minds of millions of people. That carries a responsibility which the clear-thinking man who makes a success as a reporter cannot and will not attempt to shirk.

"A reporter has no stand in the matter of news, he cannot take sides no matter what the issue, but, he can write into it its drama and significance."

At the trial of Henry Ford's suit against the Tribune, when, as a Tribune reporter, Kinsley was assigned to write the facts, he demonstrated his ideal of an unbiased news-gather. In explanation later, he explained that he had covered the trial as if he were writing for another paper.

"Although there are many lawyers, politicians, business men and other figures along the news path who will try to prey on friendships to keep the news favorable to them, the really great men of the reporter's acquaintance realize that they can confide in him without fear of violation," Kinsley believes. "The great bulk of real information is given out with the understanding that the quotations are not to be direct.

"The reporter deals first and last with facts. It is his business to go out and get from every possible source every fact which may bear upon the situation. He may take notes, but they are only for correct spelling, dates and other detail information. The rest is catalogued indelibly in the back of his mind, and comes forth in emergency writing.

"A reporter must be able to talk intelligently with all classes of men—the scientist about his new discovery, the theologian on the authenticity of the Apostles' Creed or the lawyer and his hysterical client, the busy corporation executive, the grafter and the uplifter. He learns to recognize truth by a sixth sense. He learns to cover his humiliation at asking questions which he feels are none of his business and to discard as rubbish the blustering praise or abuse heaped upon him by some of the characters."

Give your readers credit for imagination. Let them supply the frills for stories is Kinsley's advice. Just a touch here and there to awaken.

"The simple statement of news is always the best and the most difficult to obtain. Mere phraseology is the result of half-truths. Restraint of 'fine-writing' is one of the most valuable attributes of news writing. Someone knows all the true facts of every story. A story should be written so that the all-knowing person cannot complain of a misstatement.

"Lastly, read, read and then read some more and you will find that your education is only beginning at the point you fancied you were completely tutored.

"The character of the reporter's work has changed during the last few years, but the need for him is the same and cannot change. Stories must be shorter. With the radio supplying information and the news agencies giving bulletin sport news there is a growing field, perhaps, for the interpretative work, which is a big enough job for any man."

Rochester Club Celebrates

Celebrating the financial success of the Press Club Show of 1926, presented Feb. 9-10, more than 150 members of the editorial staffs of the five Rochester, N. Y., dailies were guests of the Rochester Press Club at a roast chicken dinner at the German-American Club on Thursday, March 25. Edward McKernon, of New York, superintendent of the Eastern Division of the Associated Press will speak at a dinner meeting of the Rochester Press Club Thursday, April 15. Arrangements for the dinner are being made by President Leo B. Skeffington and Victor H. Scales, manager of the Rochester bureau of the Associated Press.

K. C. Star Trustees in East

Trustees of the Kansas City Star, which is for sale under the will of William R. Nelson, were touring the east this week, seeking expert evaluation of the newspaper property. They are J. C. Nichols, Herbert V. Jones, and William Bolken. Irvin Kirkwood, editor, was in New York this week as was Mr. Nichols. Chicago, Philadelphia, and Washington were also visited. The Star is to be sold within two years, according to Col. Nelson's will and the trustees are seeking information as to modern methods of appraisal.

OPEN ROYAL BAKING POWDER CASE

Federal Trade Commission, After Once Dismissing Complaint, Reverses Itself Upon Dissenting Opinion of Commissioner Humphrey

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25.—The federal trade commission, after its members with one exception had dismissed the pending amended complaint against the Royal Baking Powder Company, today reversed itself and ordered that the entire case be reopened and reargued.

This action, which leaves the long fight between the Royal and Calumet Baking Powder interests pretty much where it was before, was the result of a dissenting opinion by Commissioner William E. Humphrey when all other members of the commission voted to dismiss the amended complaint, and of a demand made by B. T. Hainer, chief counsel for the commission, that he be permitted to reopen and reargue the case.

Commissioner Humphrey returned here today from Rochester, N. Y., where he went to deliver an address.

NEW GRAPHIC CITY EDITOR

Other Desk Changes Announced by Macfadden Tabloid

William E. Plummer has been appointed city editor of the New York Evening Graphic, succeeding Percy L. Trussell, resigned. L. M. Slack is now assistant city editor. Howard Swain, formerly assistant night editor, succeeds Plummer in the slot.

Plummer was at one time city editor of the Boston American. He came to New York from Boston six years ago and joined the staff of the New York Mail. He was slot man, make-up editor, and city editor of the Mail, and when that paper was taken over by the Telegram, remained a short while with the consolidated paper, before becoming slot man on the New York Evening Post. From the Post he went to the American as telegraph editor, prior to becoming a member of the Graphic staff.

An Open Letter to the ST. PETERSBURG TIMES and St. Petersburg DAILY NEWS

Relative to the withdrawal of advertising for theatres operated by this enterprise from the columns of the EVENING INDEPENDENT, permit me to make known the reasons for this action.

The decision prompting the action is based on the inalienable right that we, as an enterprise, are entitled to advertise when, how and where we deem necessary and profitable.

Our annual expenditures for local newspaper advertising affecting our local theatres, amounts to many thousands of dollars.

The action of withdrawing from the EVENING INDEPENDENT was prompted wholly by sound, economic judgment, as set forth below :

The ST. PETERSBURG TIMES is nationally recognized as one of the leading morning publications, reaching the morning readers of theatrical advertising in a most thoro and satisfactory manner, both from an advertising and reader-interest standpoint.

The St. Petersburg DAILY NEWS, an afternoon and evening publication whose phenominal circulation growth has amazed the newspaper world, reaches the readers of theatrical advertising and publicity - both in the home and on the street - so thoroughly and completely that a complete "coverage" is assured, making it unnecessary and unprofitable to advertise in another afternoon and evening paper in this City.

A careful investigation of circulation figures will sustain the fact that complete coverage, the aim of every advertiser, is consumated.

Very truly yours,
Vernon Gray.

VIRGINIA CITIES SPEND $40,000 IN DRIVE TO ATTRACT NEW BUSINESS

Newspapers Predominant Medium in Norfolk-Portsmouth Campaign to Tell Advantages of Cities for Manufacturers

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

THE first lap of one of the most interesting newspaper campaigns in the country has just been completed.

The eyes of many comunities as well as newspaper executives are centered upon Norfolk-Portsmouth, Va., from which has been emanating the $40,000 start of a long-pull campaign to sell this section's features to its logical prospects.

Copy told convincingly of great industries already located in Norfolk-Portsmouth

On June 1, 1925, a group of citizens of Norfolk and Portsmouth under leadership of Thomas P. Thompson, president of the Norfolk-Portsmouth Chamber of Commerce, decided to raise $100,000 a year for three years to be spent on national advertising to feature the area. Subscriptions came from persons in all walks of life.

A citizen's committee of 100 handled the drive for funds which were raised in spite of the fact that the tax-payers of the two adjoining communities subscribe $25,000 a year for an industrial commission, $15,000 for a convention bureau, $25,000 for a traffic commission, and recently supplied $850,000 of $1,500,000 for a new hotel.

The city of Norfolk subscribed $15,000 a year for three years and Portsmouth $3,000 a year for three years to the general advertising fund. After all subscriptions were in, the citizens named a board of control consisting of Col. S. L. Slover, publisher of the Ledger-Dispatch as chairman, and Goldsboro Serpell, chairman of the board of the Seaboard National Bank as treasurer. The J. Walter Thompson Company was chosen as agency.

On Aug 10, F. E. Turin from St. Louis was appointed manager of the fund. On Nov. 9 the first barrage of copy aimed at Big Business made its appearance.

The first piece of copy was 800 lines, preferred position, either pages two and three or pages four and five. Then came four 300-line advertisements and three 800-line advertisements, after which followed seven 450-line advertisements. The copy appeared once a week in the following newspapers:

New York Times; New York Herald Tribune; New York Journal of Commerce; Chicago Tribune; Boston Herald-Traveler; Cleveland Plain Dealer; Detroit Free Press; Philadelphia Public Ledger, morning and evening.

"If you were starting in business today —where would you locate your plant?" queried one important piece of copy. It called attention to the truth that, instead of locating haphazardly, industries today have to be scientific in plant site selections. Shaded maps were introduced to show territory where freight rates from Norfolk are cheaper than from a Great Lakes port, shaded sections to show where freight rates are cheaper than from a South Atlantic port, other shaded portions to indicate sections from which freight rates are cheaper than from a North Atlantic port. Another map showed the Norfolk-Portsmouth sector in easy reach of raw materials from this and foreign countries.

"What big business is doing in Norfolk," the theme of another, cited the Ford Motor Company and the International Portland Cement Company as two which recently have put up plants at Norfolk-Portsmouth.

"The future of American manufacturing is centered at Norfolk," "In Norfolk—raw materials cost less," "Norfolk—the center of raw materials," "Norfolk—a quick short haul to half the nation's markets," "Express steamship service at freight rates . . . to the nation's greatest markets," "Norfolk . . . the gateway to foreign markets," backed up with statistics and illustrated with maps and pictures which were designed to appeal to big business men have been among the advertisements released

Traffic World, Industrial Management, Nation's Business and Manufacturers' Record have been used at a cost so far of about $6,000. Each newspaper advertisement also has been published in the local newspapers to keep subscribers posted on what is being used. This has cost about $2,000 to date.

With the newspaper campaign as the keystone, many supplementary activities have been launched. A tourist and information booth which has been taken over by the advertising board has served over 10,000 out-of-town people. A news bureau with C. H. Hoofnagle, an experienced newspaper man, has been established.

The next leg of the campaign will take the form of an intensive drive to prevent Norfolk from losing any of its trading territory. Some 25 or 30 newspapers in and near the area will be used starting in August, supplemented by co-operation of the retail merchants. Numerous other ways of using advertising are planned for the future.

Meantime, leads which come in from the present first-step industrial advertising campaign, which is keyed, are followed down, in many instances by personal calls. Four engineers are at work on a full-time basis with the industrial commission, each with his particular duty to perform. Each man has his bag packed for a hurry-up trip as needed.

"The people of Norfolk and Portsmouth are organized," F. E. Turin stated. "They are working together. They are boosting for a bigger and better place in the eyes of the world.

"The whole state of Virginia is getting together and it is entirely possible that before long a state advertising campaign will be launched with direct financial support from the state government."

"Inside Correspondence" of Cabinet Members Revealed at Banquet of White House Photographers' Association

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Mar. 25.—Cabinet members laughed at themselves as they underwent an intensive fire of good-natured satire directed at their recent activities by Washington correspondents and news photographers at the White House News Photographers Association banquet at the Mayflower Hotel last night.

Verbal grenades, cartoons and a movie entitled "The Truth About Washington" were presented.

Vera Cathcart's detention on Ellis Island and Brigadier General Smedley Butler's charges that his reception to San Diego was "all wet" received the lion's share of the ridicule.

"Inside correspondence" concerning these cases was read by Theodore Tiller, toastmaster and veteran Washington correspondent, who declared he unearthed the telegrams from secret files of Secretary of Labor James J. Davis and Secretary of the Navy Curtis D. Wilbur, both of whom were sitting at the head table with him.

The "Inside correspondence" was:

Secretary of Labor Davis, Washington, D. C.: Countess Pushcart at Ellis Island accompanied by Moral Turpitude. What shall I do?—Curran, Commissioner of Immigration at New York.

Curran, Commissioner of Immigration, New York: Let in countess but keep out turpitude. Ask no questions.—Davis.

Davis, Washington: Too late. I've already asked her about turpitude.—Curran.

Curran, New York: You have played hob. Never ask a lady such things. Where is the Earl of Red Raven?—Davis.

Davis, Washington: Countess Pushcart was too darned frank. I resign. Earl of Red Raven gone to Ottawa. Do I quit?—Curran.

Curran, New York: You do. It's the Earl of Red Raven alive or Curran officially dead.—Davis.

Regarding the Smedley Butler charges, Toastmaster Tiller read:

To commanding officer, marine corps base, San Diego: Have you a man there named Medley Scuttler and also another officer named Williams.

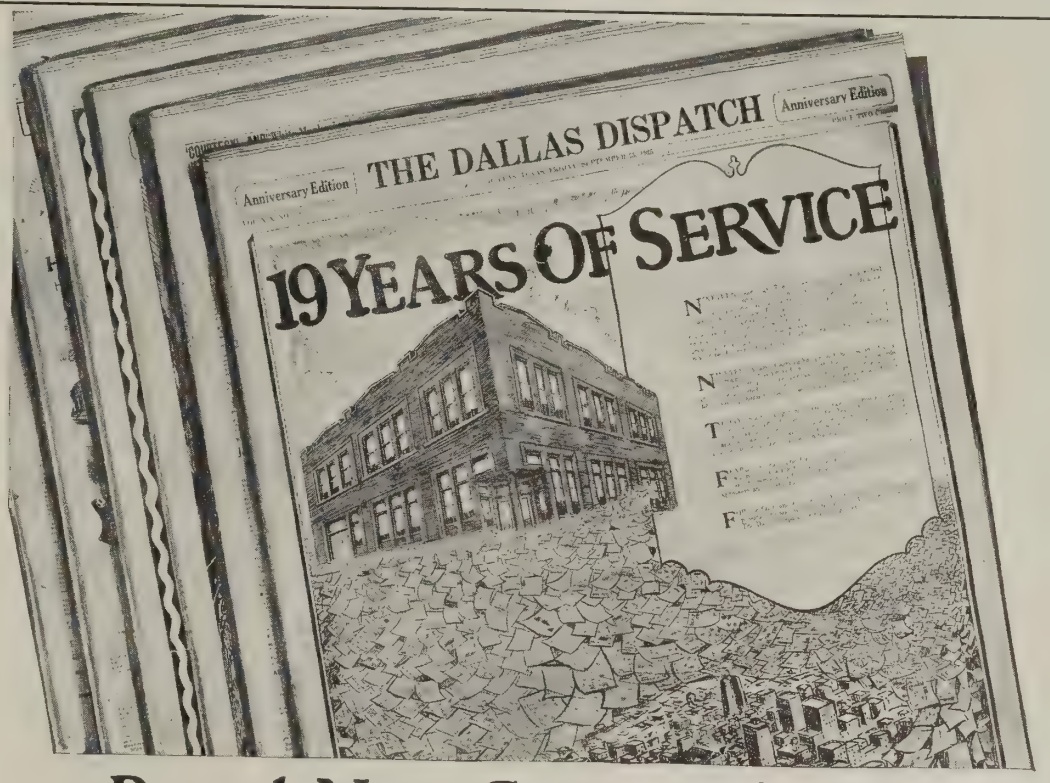
Curtis D. Wilbur, Secretary of the Navy:

Secretary of the Navy Wilbur: we have a man who came here from Philadelphia where he made such a glowing success that he quit. Understand an officer named Williams asked him to have a drink and Medley Scuttler answered he never took one in the morning after the night before.—Commanding Officer, San Diego.

Commanding Officer, San Diego: Court martial 'em all. I hate cocktails, synthetic gin, etherized beer and Volstead liquors. Pay no attention to the current newspaper polls.—Wilbur.

The film "The Truth About Washington" included pictures, never before shown, of former Representative Andrew Volstead's dash across the White House lawn to escape news photographers; showed John Coolidge, the President's son, before, during, and after his recent boxing bout at Amherst, and other unusual flashes of officialdom.

Guests of honor at the dinner, which was arranged by Major Albert Holland, George Dorsey and J. C. Brown, included Postmaster General Harry S. New, Secretary of the Navy Curtis D. Wilbur, Secretary of Agriculture W. M. Jardine, Secretary of Labor James J. Davis and Speaker Longworth.



PLANNING A PLANT THAT WILL LAST

the newspaper's establishment or part of the building temporarily rented for the purpose of supporting a portion of the capital charges. Partitions can be removed in these plants to afford additional press or composing machine capacity. Private offices are thus converted into additional floor space for general or editorial work-rooms, the private-office occupants being moved to space formerly rented. In some cities, where desirable land is scarce and operations must be conducted on expensive tracts in the business district the structure can be assembled in distinct units, with the newspaper occupying several contiguous floors and the remaining space rented or leased to meet debt service charges.

One would be rash indeed to make any definite predictions as to the newspaper business during the next ten or twenty years. No authority has yet ventured to say that bulk advertisng has reached its peak. No one believes that newspapers have found the circulation saturation point. However, definite records for advertising and circulation now exist for the past 10 or 12 years, while such records were non-existent for the previous similar period and the publisher can plan the future with definite knowledge of the past that was denied to his predecessors.

With these and the other suggested information in mind, the publisher of the metropolitan daily or the up-and-coming paper in the thriving cities of 50,000 or more population can calculate his needs for the coming years, look to his present income and its future prospects and set aside the necessary capital for the paper's new home. It should be adequate for a useful life of 20 years, according to Samuel P. Weston, of New York, who has designed a number of newspaper plants in the past five years. That may appear to be an unattainable ideal in the present condition of the newspaper business. To seek it will at least give the building a chance to pay its cost before it is crowded out of existence.

How a Brand New Goss Perfectly Printed the Dispatch's 19th Anniversary Edition

"The new Southwestern record that I believe you made by having the press operating in twenty-four days after it was taken off the cars, was further enhanced by the amazing fact that we were receiving perfectly printed papers from the new machine before more than a total of one-third of a roll of 70 inch paper had been run through it."

CHAS. H. NEWELL

Vice President and General Manager

THE DALLAS DISPATCH

Picture installing a new press in a race against time and then calling upon that press to pitch in and print the biggest issue of the year as its maiden effort!

Yet that is the story behind the publication on September 25th of the Nineteenth Anniversary Edition of THE DALLAS DISPATCH— an issue containing 99,372 lines of advertising and running to 34,000 copies.

The DISPATCH had a Goss Quad, but a 6,657 growth in circulation and a 1,018,416 increase in advertising lineage during a single year called for the addition of a Goss Straightline Sextuple.

The new press and a Goss erector reached Dallas August 31. The evening of September 24 witnessed this press turning out the first sections of the Anniversary Edition—without delays from hot bearings or anything else of a vital nature!

"Pressmen from other papers were amazed and enthused over the performance. If I attempted to repeat all they said in praise of the machine, the speed and skill with which it was erected and almost perfect work it did from the start it would fill a book," advises Mr. Newell.

"Not the slightest thing from first to last has occurred to cause The Dallas Dispatch any regret that it has relied wholly upon Goss for the additional press and stereotyping equipment necessary to make our plant thoroughly modern and large enough to care for the needs of this growing city."

Goss Presses are the choice of successful publishers everywhere. Catalog on request.

SCHOOL WORK BECOMES REAL BUSINESS FOR KANSAS UNIVERSITY MEN

Students Take Turns Gathering News for Daily Kansan—Basketball Matches Being Reported This Month—Annual Trips Made to City Newspapers

By W. A. DILL

Assistant Professor of Journalism, University of Kansas

AS much practice under normal newspaper working conditions as possible is one goal of the department of journalism of the University of Kansas.

To this end, all reporting students are expected to take their turns in gathering news for the University Daily Kansan, published five afternoons and Sunday morning by a board of university students.

Members of the Kansan board fill all the staff positions. The news editor has general supervision of the news of the day, and makes up the paper. The campus editor has duties of the ordinary city editor, appointing his news beats, listing news tips, and sending the student reporters out to get the news. All the editing of copy is done by students in editing, who thus put in "laboratory hours" in the actual practice.

An extension of the practical in reporting was authorized by the college faculty for the current year in a reporting course for seniors, "Reporting III," in which exacting reporting for the Daily Kansan is required, and during the semester trip are to be made to Topeka, Kansas City, Kan., Kansas City, Mo., and other nearby cities for the students to spend the week-end in reporting for the papers of those cities, under the direction of the city editors of the metropolitan papers.

The students in the classes in editorial writing usually spend the class hour in the discussion of campus and some national problems, and out of the discussion, such as the editorial board of any metropolitan paper would have, come the editorials that appear in the Daily Kansan.

Book reviews and music and dramatic criticism for the Daily Kansan are handled by members of the class in Critical Writing—a course having to do with the newspaper departments of music, drama, art, and books.

On the business side, the department's course in "Newspaper Administration," has for part of the laboratory work of the course the selling of advertising for the Daily Kansan. This involves salesmanship, and also, in many cases, the preparation of copy for actual advertisers.

These are the routine methods of handling the Daily Kansan, and through it the laboratory work of many of the classes in the department of journalism. Occasionally, special "stunts" are possible.

For the beginning reporters, an experience in mass reporting is offered by the annual organization of "county clubs" just prior to the Christmas holidays. On a specified day, students of the University are urged to attend meetings one of which is arranged for each of the 105 counties of Kansas, and for a dozen of the states with the larger representations in the University. With 50 or 60 beginning reporters, it is necessary to do some doubling, but a reporter is assigned to every meeting, and he is expected to report immediately to the campus desk, the names of officers elected for each county club, and any special items of business. This event for the past three years has been completed within an hour and a half after the close of the convocation hour.

Each March, the final tournament of the Kansas High School basketball league is held at the University, with 32 teams entered. The elimination tournament of 32 contests, including a consolation is run off in two days, necessitating two games at a time for the first two rounds.

Reporting II students, particularly those who have been specializing in sport writing, are assigned to cover the games, writing stories for the Daily Kansan and also for the home town papers of the players. Each year, half a dozen or more daily papers from towns having teams in the tournament, ask telegraphic stories on how their teams are placing. The tournament ends about 10 o'clock on a Saturday night, and before 11:30 a complete story of the tournament, with scores of all games, is in the mail for all Kansas papers interested.

For three years now, a member of the reporting class has prepared the summary of the tournament that has appeared in the annual basketball manual.

Annual trips are made by larger groups of reporting students to Topeka and to Kansas City, Kan., where the students are given a day in reporting events for the Topeka Capital and for the Kansas City Kansan.

Another sort of practical work, but not possible every year, is in connection with elections. One of the members of the faculty has had considerable experience with the election machinery of one of the large press associations. Prior to the last national election he discussed in his reporting class the place of the newspaper in preparing the public for an election and in gathering election returns.

On election night, one group of students was sent to Topeka to assist the Capital in gathering returns there; another group helped the Lawrence Journal-World in its compilations; and a third group made all its own arrangements and compiled county returns for a press association, and the instructor with a small group from the class went to Kansas City and wrote "leads" on the Kansas returns for the press association, taking charge of the election machinery for the state while the correspondent got a little sleep the early hours of the morning after.

Courses in Comparative Journalism, History of Journalism, the Short Story, Magazine Writing, and Trade Journalism do not offer as much opportunity for immediate commercial contacts. The course in Editorial Problems and Policies makes use of actual ethical problems, compiled by the instructor of the class and recently published in "The Conscience of the Newspaper."

CHURCH ADVERTISING FORUM

—Planned in connection with the international advertising convention—

In the past year, church advertising has become tremendously more pronounced all over the country. Interest is being manifested particularly by clergymen and prominent laymen, and especially those laymen of business connections who have learned the value of well planned publicity.

Religious leaders are beginning to feel that advertising is the most effective means of attracting people to houses of worship.

At the international convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs in Philadelphia, June 19-24, 1926, the Church Advertising Department will hold three sessions, educational in nature, to provide facilities and information that will enable churches to do effective advertising.

Plan to attend these sessions, June 22-23. Make your reservations early!

INDUSTRIAL TRIUMPHS IN THE SOUTH INDICATE FINANCIAL SOUNDNESS

The total value of exports from Southern ports for 1921 to 1923, both inclusive, was $1,459,000,000, while for the four year period from 1910 to 1914 the total from Southern ports was $774,000,000.

In 1881 the total deposits in national and state banks in the sixteen Southern states aggregated $221,759,000, while in 1923 these deposits amounted to $5,958,175,000. In 1880 the total bank resources of the South were $650,000,000. In 1923 the resources of the Southern banks amounted to $8,500,000,000.

In fifty years deposits in all the banks in the country increased twenty-fold, while the deposits in Southern banks have grown almost forty-fold.

This record of growth in Southern banking is a striking fact reflecting the increased agricultural, commercial and industrial activities in these states.

Into this fabric of activities has been woven, in brilliant colors, the record of advertising achievements.

Advertising successes are part of the commercial accomplishments of the South.

For successful merchandising, greater consumer demand must be created.

This can be accomplished by newspaper advertising.

U. S. REPORTERS PRAISED BY BRITISH WRITER

London Daily News Correspondent Lauds Enthusiasm of Americans—Impressed by Financial Resources of Our Press

Wilson Midgley, special correspondent in the United States of the London Daily News, left New York March 27, on the Olympic, on a brief business trip to consult with his paper. He arrived in New York a year ago as the Daily News resident correspondent.

Wilson Midgely

Midgley's visit to London will coincide with the making of extensive additions to the premises of the Daily News. This newspaper, exponent of liberal ideas from the days of Charles Dickens to A. G. Gardiner, is in the process of extending its plant in Bouverie street. The completed building will be opened in the summer by Lord Oxford and Asquith.

The election campaign of 1924 was the occasion of Midgley's first visit to America. His coming in 1925 was, therefore, a return. Looking back on a year of "covering" a continent, he said his most interesting story was the Dayton trial.

"I was the only English correspondent who was present throughout the trial. And I think I was more impartial to both Fundamentalists and Modernists than most of the American correspondents!"

In his work as a foreign correspondent Mr. Midgley tries to impress his English readers with the complexity of American life, and to resist the temptation to play up to the ready-made idea of America which they already have.

"One of the temptations of a foreign correspondent," he stated, "is to play up to the idea of a country that is popular at the moment, and to send only stories that fit into this concept. It is better to perplex one's readers a trifle. It is better to leave them somewhat puzzled rather than to pretend every problem is simple.

"I am impressed by the financial resources and the wide extent of American journalism, and also by the work that is being done at the various universities in schools of journalism which supply newspapers with the best human material, equipped with the best preparation for journalism that the world has known so far. I am also impressed by the way in which young journalists take journalism on the way to more literary pursuits, a practice which is bound to reflect back on American journalism some of the better and more solid qualities of literary work. American journalists show an extraordinary devotion to their paper. They play the game for the sake of the game—not more than but just as much as any other journalists I have ever met. They play it with that intensity which seems so characteristic of the journalistic profession. Men will kill themselves in newspaper work upon things which to other men would seem too detached from their own interests to be important.

"There is one characteristic of English journalism which appeals to me, and that is the ability to compress information into a paragraph. The man who can say a thing in ten words is regarded more highly on an English newspaper than the one who says it in half-a-column. Here I have often been amused to see young American newspapermen measuring the worth of the story by its length—a long story having more value than a short one!"

Mr. Midgley will return to New York early in May.

JOHN D. SHERMAN

Chicago Veteran Wrote "Public Be Damned" Vanderbilt Interview

John Dickinson Sherman, veteran Chicago newspaper man, died last week. Mr. Sherman was born in Chicago, Aug. 30, 1859. He was graduated from Hamilton college in 1881 and became a suburban correspondent for the Chicago Tribune the following year. In 1889, he was made city editor of the Tribune, serving in that capacity until 1896 when he became Sunday editor.

In 1898 after a short service with the Chicago Record-Herald, he became city editor of the old Chicago Inter-Ocean, holding that position until 1902 when he became literary editor and later associate editor of the Weekly Inter-Ocean and Farmer, a position he held until the Inter-Ocean was merged with the Record-Herald in 1914. Since then he had been associated with the Western Newspaper Union.

In an address delivered last year before the students of the Medill School of Journalism, Mr. Sherman told of the old days of Chicago journalism and also of the celebrated "public be damned" interview of the late William H. Vanderbilt. Mr. Sherman told the Medillians he elicited the famous statement from Mr. Vanderbilt by inquiring as to whether his trains were run for profit or as an accommodation to the public.

Mr. Sherman is survived by a widow, Mrs. Mary King Sherman, president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs with headquarters in Washington, and by four brothers.

"production materially increased"

"I have your letter of the 12th relative to the Models 25 and 26 Linotypes installed in our office during the Summer of 1925.

"We are very much pleased indeed with the new machines. Our production per machine has materially increased over the old Model 1's, and we are working all of them steadily every day and, off and on, night shifts. The fact that we have a large number of additional mats in magazines for quick change has been very helpful toward production, and this is a great reason for efficiency. Our workmen have nothing but words of praise for the new equipment throughout."

BIROTADRUCK
(Bi-rota-druck)
Hydraulic Matrice Press and Process

The American Birotadruck matrice press and process is a hydraulic direct pressure matrice moulding press and process—definite in all its functions moulding a perfect die cut and embossed mat ready for the casting box without loss of time. No more crushed type or blurred pages.

Any desired pressure may be obtained without injury to type or illustrations. Under the Birotadruck process half tone illustrations are embossed and the matrice die sunk simultaneously with the moulding operation.

There are no changes necessary on presses, stereo or other equipment. The Birotadruck Matrice Press and Process takes the place of Matrice Rolling machines and adds refinements and features not heretofore available.

Either wet or dry mats may be used with full success.

Installations have been made on the plants of the New York Times, New York Herald-Tribune, Boston Globe, Dallas News and machines are being built on orders from other metropolitan newspapers.

N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE PLANS NEW HOME

Present Plant, Built in 1922, Now Inadequate—Expect to Start Building in Another Year—Additional Equipment Being Installed

The New York Herald Tribune will be starting work on a new plant inside of a year, Howard Davis, business manager, informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week. The present home of this New York morning newspaper was only completed in April, 1922, but Mr. Davis said it was already being cramped for space. There is no opportunity of enlarging the building at its present location. He said he did not know where land would be purchased.

Need of a new plant results from the consolidation of the Tribune with the New York Herald in March, 1923, Mr. Davis said. The present building on West 41st street, designed for the Tribune, was at the time thought large enough to allow for normal growth over a period of 15 or 20 years. When built, and even today, the plant is generally spoken of as a model structure to house newspaper manufacturing operations. But only recently the management was forced to push out into an adjoining building to increase circulation department floor space.

More space will be needed this summer when three Helverson stuffing machines are to be installed. By June, Mr. Davis said, the Herald Tribune will be ready to distribute the first five sections of its Sunday newspaper all stuffed to news dealers.

The Herald Tribune is now installing two Cox Speedaumatic mailer machines. It is expected they will be ready for operation early in April. These machines wrap mail and bag newspapers. The Herald Tribune has a large mailing list, particularly in Summer, when it totals approximately 300,000 copies daily with more Sunday.

The Herald Tribune is at present installing eight Scott press units, and when work is completed the press room will have nine octuple presses.

The outstanding value of our Service is its ability to relieve a publisher of his entire checking proof detail.. and giving him absolute confidence that he has at last found an efficient and practical solution to his problem.

MACY'S IMITATES NEWS PAGE STYLE IN ITS ADVERTISING COPY

Ads of Various Departments Pyramided Under News Stories to Resemble Regular Page—Dailies Insist On Slight Change to Avoid Deceiving Readers

R. H. MACY & CO., INC., New York department store, this week introduced a new form for retail newspaper advertising copy, which breaks up a full page with part of the linage being used to tell store news in imitation news style, and the remainder of the linage made up of pyramid advertisements from various departments. James Goold, the store's advertising director, was responsible for the innovation.

When the first copy appeared Monday the page was labeled once at the top in small type with the heading "Macy's Daily News-Ad" and the headline type over the imitation news stories was the same as regularly employed by the paper in which the advertisements were published. The managements of the New York Sun, Telegram, and the New York Evening World, by Wednesday had changed this procedure, insisting that "Macy's Daily News-Advertisement" in large type be printed three times at the top of the page, and different type be used in the advertising matter than appeared in the news columns, to avoid deception.

A banner headline in Monday's copy read "New Spring Apparel Ready at Macy's for New York Shoppers" and carried the sub-headings "Trip Through Store Answers Questions of What to Wear," and "Departments Overflowing with Gloriously New Merchandise—Many Smart Notes in Spring-time Accessories." A one-column box and four smaller heads made up the remainder of the editorialized copy, while 12 separate advertisements placed in pyramid make-up promoted offerings in that many departments of the store.

The new form of advertising was described as an effort to make the store's a new type of daily advertisement, of which this page is the first example.

"The new plan departs from the traditional 'page ad' style, which, of necessity fails to do full justice to the diversified advertising messages of the 155 selling departments of the store, in which is to be found almost every human merchandise requirement, whether it be for the home or for the person, for sustenance of life or for indulgence of luxury.

"Henceforth each department will be regarded as an individual shop, which it virtually is, and its advertising message will be presented as a complete and separate unit as on this page. The individual advertisements will be supplemented daily by brief articles of interest to the shopper.

"For a long time Macy's has felt itself hampered in communicating to the readers of its advertising the things it wanted to tell them about the store and its merchandise. The limitations of advertising space and the requirements of advertising display necessitated the utmost brevity of language, the suggestion of an idea, rather than its full explanation.

"With the publication of these articles daily, Macy's believes that this difficulty will be overcome and that it will be able to pass on to shoppers valuable information in a form they will find easy and pleasant to read."

Copy was similar in all dailies used, but the type dress differed to correspond to that of the newspapers in which it appeared.

"We are adapting our advertising to the media used," Mr. Goold said in an interview with EDITOR & PUBLISHER, and called attention to the fact that Macy copy in the New York Mirror, picture tabloid, had for the last six months appeared as a "picture page," the merchandise displayed on models and reproduced from photographs.

"What we are trying to do," he continued, "is to issue a daily publication on our page, which gives instruction and information to readers as well as urges them to buy. The possibilities are unlimited for conveying in comparatively small space a great deal of information that we could not get into display space.

"In addition to writing regular copy, our copy writers have been assigned to dig up news in the various departments. The new style of copy gives them added incentive and initiative in finding such news. They have been instructed to make thorough studies of the merchandise they write about, to do research work, involving history and economics, and in general to keep abreast of the current events in preparing their advertising news."

Mr. Goold explained that his staff of 10 copy writers had been organized as a newspaper editorial staff. He himself, before becoming advertising manager of Macy's five years ago, was in newspaper work, connected with the Fairchild Publications, New York.

The New York Times Advertising Standards

To protect readers of The New York Times, every advertisement offered for publication is subject to censorship and must conform to The Times standards and conception of a newspaper's obligation to the public. Through this censorship the advertising columns of The Times are kept free from questionable and "catchpenny" offers of undesirable firms.
The Times publishes a larger volume of advertising than any other New York newspaper; but it takes more pride in the high quality and character of that advertising than in the unequaled volume.
The Times declines advertising that is fraudulent or misleading, detrimental to the public welfare or that may cause loss of confidence in reputable advertising and honorable business.
The Times has the largest circulation of any standard sized New York morning newspaper.

BOSTON GROUP BACKS A.A.C.W. DRIVE

Advertising Club, Headed by Rogers, of Transcript, Pledges $10,000 to Aid Parent Association—Co-operation Promised Elsewhere

The Advertising Club of Boston, of which W. F. Rogers, advertising director of the Boston Transcript, is president, meeting this week pledged itself to raise a minimum $10,000 as its contribution to the $500,000 refinancing campaign now being conducted by the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. The meeting held March 23 was addressed by Earle Pearson, A. A. C. W. manager.

Frank A. Black, advertising manager of William Filene & Sons, Boston department store, was appointed chairman of a temporary committee named to make arrangements for the Boston campaign, scheduled to get under way early in April. Mr. Pearson pointed out that of the total operating expenses of the organization last year, approximately $250,000, the city of Boston only contributed $2,500. He told how New York advertising men were organizing to raise $100,000 towards the goal of $500,000, and said that Chicago next month would start a special drive for $75,000.

Francis H. Sisson, vice-president of the Guaranty Trust Company, New York, and chairman of the general campaign committee, will address the club April 1, giving complete details of the A. A. C. W.'s expansion plans.

Mr. Pearson on his return to New York headquarters, reported that the Boston club, under Mr. Rogers' leadership, was in a better condition today than ever before in its history, with a membership of more than 500.

PRAISES NEWSPAPER SPACE

Advertising Called Labor Saving Machine of Sales for Merchant

Newspaper advertising is the labor-saving machine of sales for the merchant, was the opinion expressed last Wednesday at the meeting of the Cincinnati Advertisers Club by David Gibson, merchandising specialist, formerly publisher of the Lorain (O.) Journal.

"Some will be inclined to say that newspaper advertising is an added item of expense" said Mr. Gibson, "but it is not. Advertising is a short-time investment for a big dividend from increasing turnover, transforming gross into net and quicker cash returns to gain discounts on bills of goods. It is not an expense any more than a labor-saving machine to increase production is an expense. There are those who think that advertising adds to the cost of the goods, but they are wrong. It simply speeds up operations and gets quicker and surer results."

Factories are Busy in

ILLINOIS

With More Persons at Work

Factories in Illinois were busier in February and March than at any time in two years. Not since May, 1924, were as many persons at work in the manufacturing plants of this state as were found employed during the month by the survey of the Illinois Department of Labor. In thirty days 1.6 per cent more persons were added to the pay rolls of the factories. If the operations of approximately 1,200 employers reporting to the department may be taken as a representative of the whole realm of factory employment, 11,000 persons have been put to work since January.

Employment in the agricultural implement factories was still on the up grade with an increase of 1.8 per cent in the number of workers.

For market information of this industrially rich territory, housing a vast army of well paid workers, consult the Illinois daily newspapers and, through their advertising columns, deliver your message directly into the homes.

BUSINESS BUREAU PUBLICITY SERVES PUBLISHER, ADVERTISER AND PUBLIC

This Is Conclusion Reached by Bureau Representative After Analysing Aims and Methods, With Public Reaping Greatest Benefit

By R. F. MURPHY
Representative, National Better Business Bureau

PUBLICITY is as much the life-blood of Better Business Bureau work as it is of any commercial enterprise. The probabilities are that it is more so. In some of the communities that have local Bureaus, the prevalence of misconception regarding their aims and methods is amazing; in those that have not, the citizenry lives in the most complete ignorance of their existence. To correct the public misconceptions and erase the widespread ignorance of what we consider a very essential work, publicity—well-developed and highly specialized publicity must be the tool.

Paid publicity, for most Bureaus, is out of the question. Educational advertising in such media as newspapers and magazines at regular commercial rates is an impossibility. The movement must depend on publicity in unpaid space. One necessary consideration is that the Bureau have full control over any such matter. In the several Bureaus that have succeeded in getting enough space to tell their story to a waiting world, the attainment and continuance of this most desirable privilege has been a matter which required the most delicate of delicate handling.

The basis for the suspicion which first meets requests for unpaid publicity is unfamiliarity with the Better Business Bureau's aims. "Whose axe are you grinding?" sums up the attitude of the listener to these requests.

The question deserves an answer. Whose axe, in fact, does Better Business Bureau publicity grind?

The publisher's axe?

There was once a Better Business Bureau that had been most fortunate in the matter of cooperation given it by the newspapers of its city. Three were giving it regular space in their columns. In one, the series of educational advertisements had run unbroken for a period of some 18 months. The copy appeared weekly in some 15 inches of space, an in regularly assigned position.

Of course, the series attracted the attention of other Bureaus which wanted to emulate this success. One, from the South, wrote and asked what the space would cost if it were paid. It became my duty to interview the newspaper's advertising manager.

I told him of the inquiry, where it came from and why our correspondent wanted the information.

He took his pencil, made a few calculations, leaned back with an expansive smile and said: "My dear boy, we would have to charge you $20,000 a year at regular commercial rates for the space you are getting for nothing." In other words, that newspaper, besides making a substantial subscription to Bureau work, was willing to augment that amount by some $20,000. He made a few more comments; he considered us extremely fortunate; his paper deserved real commendation for its generosity; he doubted whether any one of the city's journals would duplicate his paper's donation. He became so effusive that it became a bit irritating.

"You must be getting something for this expenditure," I told him. "No business man is paying thousands of dollars every year for nothing. It seems to me that our little series of educational material inserted regularly over our name lends something to your paper that it could not get in any other way. It commits you, does it not, to observance and strict observance, of the principles for which this movement stands. The public construes it as the Better Business Bureau's endorsement of you and your advertisers. This, and I speak frankly, this despite the fact that there are times when I am ashamed to see our name in the advertising company where you place us. If you're spending $20,000 a year on us, you're getting your money's worth and more in the increased attention and confidence which your readers give your advertisers."

"Well," he said, "now you're getting a bit too close to fundamentals."

"That," I rejoined is precisely what we're after. Some of us object to being held up as mendicants. You want our name but you don't like to admit it."

He did admit it finally. That Bureau is still getting its space. The newspaper's level of advertising is higher than ever before.

Perhaps the publisher may find his Better Business Bureau an efficient and profitable grindstone for his blade.

The Better Business Bureau's Axe?

Not altogether.

The Better Business Bureau can do no good in the measure that it is known. Certainly the staff members of a Bureau are not in the work for the sake of money. No Bureau is trying to make a profit. Sales are not their gauge of success as they are in a commercial organization. They seek no social or political capital.

They work, and work hard: but publicity, as we have said, is essential to that work's accomplishment.

No one can validly claim that any Better Business Bureau seeks publicity for its own sake.

No, it isn't the Bureau's axe.

The advertiser's axe?

To some degree, yes. Most Bureau's make it a part of their policy to forbid their subscribers to use their connection with the Bureau as a means toward commercial exploitation. The circle of Better Business Bureau support is all-inclusive. The door is open to the user of occasional classified copy and the buyer of full page spreads alike.

At the same time, no merchant, banker, newspaper or manufacturer who is fair to the public in business dealings can fail to benefit through any publicity published by the Bureau. It matters not one iota whether or not he chances to contribute toward the organization's support. Of course the square dealer benefits, no matter what his business may be: for the Bureaus, through their investigation and exposure of commercial frauds, make it unnecssary for the legitimate enterprise to spend valuable time and money in fighting fakers.

They benefit too from the constantly positive and constructive effort of the Better Business Bureaus to awaken in the public mind a strong feeling of confidence in truthful advertising and fair play.

It would be folly to claim that publicity by the Bureau movement grinds no tools for the business man.

The public's axe?

Emphatically yes! More than any one's else!

Some Bureau publicity is intended to warn.

More is meant to inform.

But it is not calculated solely to warn or inform the publisher, or the advertiser. It is for consumer consumption, for the Better Business Bureau's are most interested in getting their findings before Mr. and Mrs. Bill Jones, every-day, hard-working American citizens.

During the Great War, Uncle Sam found himself short of sailors to take men and supplies to France. There were not enough men in the regular Navy to do the job. The Navy Department saw that the only way to get trained seamen was to recruit them from the merchant marine. It did, and it found good timber, officers and men. But it also found that there were jealousies. The merchant sailors regarded the navy as one long, pink tea party, while the navy men considered the merchantmen a crowd of ignorant heathens. So serious was the obstacle that there was a hurried search for a diplomatic seaman in naval circles who might iron out the trouble, and finally they found him. He did a good job, and at the great banquet after the armistice where regulars and reserve men drank together he was acclaimed by both factions as "the man who got the navy to see the merchant marine and the merchant marine to see the navy."

In that naval officer, the Better Business Bureau can find a close analogy; for to interpret business to the layman and the layman's mind to business is probably the greatest service that any Bureau can render.

That's why it wants publicity: the advertiser wants it; the shopper wants to read about the Bureau's work. The publisher wants it too, but often, like the man we write about, he doesn't know it. For it is the newspaper, the advertiser, and above all the reading and buying public who have axes for the Better Business Bureaus to grind!

BEN FRANKLIN KNEW VALUE OF "TELLING MORE" IN CLASSIFIED ADS

Survey of His Pennsylvania Gazette Shows Complete Descriptions of Properties for Sale, Lost Articles and Runaway Slaves

By CHARLES H. CARSON

Manager, Merchandising-Service Department, Roanoke (Va.) Times

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, not only the father of printing and one of our first and most important newspaper publishers, was also a classified manager of no mean ability as is evidenced by the copies of his well-known Pennsylvania Gazette of the seventeen hundreds. For is it not plausible that Franklin as the general manager of The Gazette, also instructed those who desired to insert advertisements, in the proper wording and display of same?

In a copy of the Pennsylvania Gazette of February 1753, which bears the imprint on the last page "Philadelphia—Printed by B. FRANKLIN, Post-Master and D. HALL at the New Printing-Office, near the Market," we find the now well-known classified advertisement in all of the glory that the present day classified manager wishes to surround it. In 1753 what few notices and advertisements that did appear in Franklin's paper, were in the form that we now term as "classified," display advertising being practically unknown. To-day in our classified advertisements, one of the great obstacles to overcome is getting the prospective advertiser to use enough words to adequately describe his offering or to tell his story so that it will be understood. He is all too prone to count so many words at so many cents a word, thereby decreasing the efficiency of his message for the sake of the saving of a number of cents.

But look at Benjamin Franklin as a classified manager!

To-day we are likely to have the following:

FOR SALE—Farm of 200 acres. Apply to William Parr, care News.

Then when the allotted time of this advertisement has run, Mr. William Parr cusses out the paper and its classified columns because they do not pull. He forgets that he is trying to sell a proposition that runs into the thousands, at an advertising cost of a few cents.

Yesterday, Benjamin Franklin inserted the following in his columns:

TO BE SOLD—together or in parcels, a plantation, in Oxford township, situate within half a mile of Frankford, on the great road, leading from Philadelphia to Bristol, being in front on said road upwards of 200 perches, containing 152 acres, or thereabouts, 40 acres whereof is good wood-land, a house and 6 acres of orchard, large young bearing trees, of the choicest fruits; the whole under good new fence, and a fine stream of water whereon a mill might be erected) running thro' the whole, called Tackony creek. For title and terms of sale, enquire of William Parr, attorney at law, in Second-street, Philadelphia.

Can you not get very interesting reading out of the above advertisement and do you not believe that this effort would sell the plantation many times quicker than most of the present day efforts at classified writing?

Lost advertisements were also in vogue in Franklin's day and in these too we find a contrast with the present. Scanning this morning's paper I find the following:

LOST—On Jefferson street, ladies purse. Return to 314 Harmon Place, S. W.

That was the advertisement that the lady who lost the purse handed in to the classified department. Evidently no trouble was taken to have her express herself better, or to describe the purse, or to state whether or not a reward was offered and many other points that should have been embodied in the advertisement. If this same lady could have walked into the office of the Pennsylvania Gazette back in the year 1753, either young Mr. Franklin or young Mr. Hall would have shown her how to have worded her advertisement so that it would bring results, naturally bringing in more revenue for the owners of the paper. The following is an example of their work along the same line:

Dropt in the Market, on Wednesday, the 24th of last month, A small work'd Pocket Book, lined with red, bound and tied with green, with sundry papers of considerable value, but of no use to any but the owner. Whoever will bring them to the New-Printing Office, shall have Five Shillings reward, and no questions ask'd.

Today of course there is no such thing as a slave running away or the disappearance of an indentured servant, but we do have notices of runaway boys and girls appearing in our classified columns, stray horses and cows and such as that. How much more effective would such advertisements be if today they could be described with such vividness as in the days of Franklin, shown in the following:

RUN away from his bail, in the township of Salisbury, Lancaster county, in the province of Pennsylvania, A man named James Douglas, between 30 and 40 years of age, of middle stature, pale complexion; Had on when he went away, An old felt hat, worsted cap, an old brown coat, piec'd in several places, two blue jackets, one of a lighter blue than the other, two check shirts, the neck and sleeves of one of the shirts is different from the body, sheep-skin breeches, flower'd about the button-holes, sky-blue stockings, pretty good shoes, without buckles; has a wart under his left ear; and is a great snuff-taker; He took a pocket pistol with him. He came from Ireland last year, and has a receipt that he got from Mr. Knox in Londonderry, when he paid his passage and 'tis supposed he will pass by it. Whoever takes up and secures the said James Douglas, so as the subscriber may have him again, shall have Three Pounds as a reward, paid by me.

WILLIAM M'CAMANY.

January 31, 1753.

In fact after scanning the columns of the Pennsylvania Gazette and other newspapers of that period, one is nearly forced to the conclusion that the best news writers of the time were those who prepared the classified advertisements appearing in the columns. Here and there one may find some of the most interesting items appearing in the paper. Take as an example the following, which was inserted as an advertisement:

WHEREAS, Thomas Ageman, late of the city of Burlington, in the western division of the province of New Jersey, has been missing, ever since the 30th of March last, and no one hereabouts being able to give any account of him, hath induced his son William Ageman, and most of his neighbors, to be suspicious that he is murder'd: These are to desire the favour of the readers hereof, that if they are any of them, can give any account of the said Thomas Ageman, either living or dead, that if they will be so good as to communicate the same to his son William Ageman, by directing their letters to George Eyre, Esq; in Burlington, it will very much oblige him and his neighbours; and likewise clear the person who is suspected to be guilty of the murder; who, upon examination, denies the fact. He is a lusty man if living, about 80 years of age, a labouring man.

In interesting compelling expressions these advertisements of 172 years ago surpass anything that our largest papers of today can offer. And speaking of interest compelling expressions, how is this one for maintaining interest over a period of 172 years:

TO BE SOLD, by John Sayre in Market Street, choice Muscovado sugar in tierces and barrels, and good Pennsylvania rum by the hogshead.

Benjamin Franklin was a classified manager par-excellence. He has his advertisers to tell their story completely, in an interesting way and regardless of the style of display there is no doubt that they received full value for their money and that the advertisements in the Gazette were productive.

It has been some time since Henry Ford bought Longfellow's village blacksmith shop, and we wonder why somebody hasn't also sold him the remains of the Hesperus by this time.—Kansas City Star.

ONLY a novelist like Frank B. Elser could have written "The Keen Desire" (Boni & Liveright). It has a newspaper background that could not be faked. It has a setting that requires on the part of the author a working experience not only on a small city daily but also on a metropolitan sheet. To its author it gives preferred position among American novelists.

Elser, born in Texas, spent his college days at Cornell. After leaving college he became a hobo and then an unskilled laborer working in an Oklahoma City hide vat and then in a Guthrie short-order restaurant. At various times he "subbed" for small city dailies, saw a lot of the country as a member of a small circus, and finally landed in New York where for a time he was a messenger boy on Wall Street. But the smell of printer's ink lured him back to the newspaper business. He joined the staff of the Evening Sun and later was connected with the New York Times. His roving disposition, however, carried him over to the Associated Press where he became a war correspondent with a keen desire for great adventures.

In tracing the career of Elser I have given the theme of his story up to the time a connection is made with the Evening Sun. But I do not mean to imply that the novel is autobiographical—though many readers will take it as such, so realistically are newspaper experiences recorded in the tale.

The subject matter of "The Keen Desire" is not new but the mode of treatment is original. Incident after incident passes along as though they were being prepared by the copy desk before the deadline closed. Frankly they are so rushed that they have been improved by skillful application of the blue pencil—but too much must not be expected from the first novel which has the advantage of being overset, if anything, with cross sections of life.

Elser is at his best in his realism of newspaper work. The Cornell Daily Sun may possibly take exception to the student life protrayed for Ithaca. But many readers of Editor & Publisher will recognize the characters who worked on the Evening Sun and its older sister which was earlier on the street in a morning edition. Indeed, these characters are so thinly disguised and given names that approach so closely real names that grounds for libel exist if characters have been held up to public scorn—which they are not. Even the ubiquitous "World Almanac" figures in the story.

The novel deserves the O. K. of the critic for the restraint the author has shown in handling climactic situations revolving around sex problems. The heart throb is there but not the sex appeal, the hokum injected by so many novelists to make their books sell. Elser has produced a piece of literature of which "Our Own World of Letters" may well be proud.

MIDWESTERN editors will be interested in "Beginnings of the Modern Newspaper" by Orland Kay Armstrong, a bulletin belonging to the Journalism Series published by the School of Journalism of the University of Missouri at Columbia, Mo. Briefly, this pamphlet is a compatative study of St. Louis dailies for the half-century extending from 1875-1925.

The changes in make-up are given somewhat in detail. Contents of newspapers are listed and the accompanying tables show a lot of research work on the part of Mr. Armstrong. But possibly the most interesting sections are those devoted to the study of the news columns in these St. Louis dailies. Indeed, the author frankly asserts that the most outstanding change in newspaper production during the period covered by the pamphlet has been in the presentation of news which struggled "through decades of astonishing satire, invective, ridicule, editorial coloring of nearly every item of news, flippant treatment of subjects that today merit serious mention or no mention at all, and columns of the grotesque and morbid in news offerings."

The pamphlet closed with a review of modern tendencies which include of course combination and consolidation. From the review of tendencies in editorials two paragraphs may well be quoted:

> Newspapers are considering themselves less and less the champions of political creeds, and more and more the constructive critics of each and all in the public employment or in the public eye. Surely this is an indication of the healthy removal of the press from the rule of the demagogue, political or otherwise. The next half-century should see the tendency further exemplified.
> Constructive editorial tone has replaced a great deal of the distinctly critical in editorials of fifty years ago. Herein lies the great future of the editorial. Without doubt the editorial writers of the future who make themselves felt in more than a local sphere will be noted for the weight they can put behind politics and movements for the public good as opposed to party dictates, political or otherwise.

The bulletin is well done as the reader may see for himself if he will send a request for a copy to Walter Williams, Dean of the School of Journalism, University of Missouri, Columbia.

THE Macmillan Company announces for early publication "Graded Lessons in News Editing," by George C. Bastian, late copy reader on the staff of the Chicago Tribune. In addition to his work on the copy desk of that newspaper Mr. Bastian was lecturer on news editing at the Medill School of Journalism connected with Northwestern University. If his "Graded Lessons in News Editing" is as well done as his other book, "Editing the Day's News," it will doubtless be widely adopted by American colleges offering technical instruction in journalism.

HENRY J. LEE is the editor of "The Eagle Almanac" published by the Brooklyn Daily Eagle. The 1926 edition—the forty-first annual volume—is much larger and covers a wider range of subjects than previous issues. The latest volume has something over 600 pages of useful information about the world in general and New York City and its suburbs in particular.

Mr. Lee has wisely held back publication until the latest changes in national, state, and New York City appointments could be listed. Because of the large amount of space he has devoted to New York City "The Eagle Almanac" will be found an excellent reference book for use in editorial rooms when additional information is desired about news stories breaking in the metropolis. The price of "The Eagle Almanac" is $1.50.

FROM the Oregon Agricultural College comes The Industrial Journalist. The Department of Industrial Journalism at that institution, responsible for the birth of this periodical, was established in 1919 and is headed by Frank L. Snow, who was formerly connected with the Department of Industrial Journalism at Kansas City Agricultural College, Manhattan, Kan.

JOHN N. WHEELER whose syndicate has made his name a household word in newspaper shops prints in Collier's Weekly for Feb. 27 a personality sketch of Harry Conway Fisher, known in newspaper clubs and to newspaper readers as Bud Fisher.

Fisher in all probability is the highest paid cartoonist in the world. For drawing the comic strips of Mutt and Jeff he is said to receive more than $200,000 a year. By-products include a nice income from animated cartoons, books, plays, etc., A former student of mine now in Japan sends me with some degree of regularity Japanese newspapers. In them I frequently meet the familiar newspaper characters of Mutt and Jeff.

Mr. Wheeler heads his sketch of Fisher "Dose It Pay to Be Hard-Boiled?" The most interesting part of the article is the account of Fisher's relations with Hearst and the difficulty that arose over the contract between the two men. Several bully good human interest stories are scattered here and there in the article.

MODERN magazine editors can usually find space for an article that spanks the press, especially the metropolitan press. But when they receive a manuscript presenting press tendencies in a favorable light they "read with interest" so they say in their letters, but regret that these articles do not quite seem to fit immediate editorial needs. Scribner's Magazine has been one which, while printing articles criticizing newspapers has at the same time found space for contributions in praise of present day paes where such policies marked milestones the evolution of journalism.

Frankly, the above is a rather long ad to introduce "The Small-Town ewspaper Divorces Its Party" which ay be found in Scribner's Magazine r March. Its author is Will Rose, itor of the Cambridge Springs (Pa.) nterprise-News.

Mr. Rose reviews the so-called palmy ys of party pap for the press—the days ien political parties subscribed for news-pers by wholesale and turned over state titutes to the advertising columns as ward for special courtesies of free in-tions on the editorial page.

Mr. Rose is not too harsh on the strug-ng editors of by-gone days. He inkly admits that when he first became newspaper owner—well let him tell story:

recently had become a newspaper owner en Charles E. Hughes was a candidate for Presidency. Earlier in life he had been a professor at my university. Later I had t him personally when he was a justice of Supreme Court and when I was a member a college theatrical troupe which played in shington. Furthermore, I had been a high ool debater in New York when was the atly admired governor of that State. Lastly, appealed to me for many reasons, not the st of which was his fair and open mind, and like him. Consequently, I published nearly of the propaganda sent out by Republican ional headquarters that year. I may be per-ted to say that some of this propaganda was idedly ill-advised. It cost me the subscription a Democrat who had read my newspaper 40 years, and, being a merchant, he took advertising with him. He used to throw newspaper clear across the room when it delivered to him. I cannot say how many d readers followed his lead. In the few rs intervening I have become a much more cessful publisher. I am a Republican still. I can assure you that most of the Demo-s in my county read my newspaper regu-y, and that none of them are today throw-it across the room. Yet, sincerely and con-ntially, I think I did more for Coolidge, in e of my saner business policy, than I did for ches.

t a time when newspaper combinations being so severely criticized by amateur rmers and parlor politicians it is re-hing, if nothing more, to be reminded these combinations "have also helped divorce newspaper and parties." To question, "How then are we to main-our two party system?" Mr. Rose ies, "That is the problem of the party not of the newspaper."

The quotation given below is a purely onal opinion but it ought to give both ress and the political party something hink about:

d while the day when columns and columns ropaganda to be set in type in the news-r plant without editing has passed, both es and weeklies are more greedy than ever ood feature material. But it must be good. it must be reasonably accurate, sound, and ly in picture form. The Republicans made d start along this line in the Coolidge cam-n when the old sap bucket of the Coolidge (a very good and novel substitute for the l of the old oaken bucket) was presented Henry Ford; and other subjects, liberally ied with what is known as "human inter-t, were sent to all newspapers. The "pub-i" of the Democratic national committee in ame campaign stuck to the old-fashioned sheets filled with stuff that the publisher not afford to print, and I am sure that reat amount of it got into print for that n.

Strange as it may seem, Mr. Rose does mention legitimate political advertis-That is the proper place for politi-ropaganda printed to sell party can-es to buyers at polls.

E latest addition to the series of ooks on journalism published by D. eton & Co. is "Women in Journal-by Genevieve Jackson Boughner. e author has done as well in this ne as she did when a student in one of my journalism classes at New York University she has produced a book that will fill a long felt want—to use a much overworked phrase.

A working manual has long been needed to supplement "Journalism for Women" by Arnold Bennett as the latter volume approaches the subject from the view point of the newspapers and magazines of England. The book by Mrs. Boughner will of course be mentioned more in detail in a later issue of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

EXPERIENCED editors will not waste time if they examine somewhat carefully "Printing in the Junior High School" (American Type Founders Company) by Arthur Dean, Sc.D. It is one of the most beautiful pieces of typography that I have seen. It contains valuable historical matter and lists in a comprehensive way the educational value of a course in printing in the high school.

A FEW days before (30) was written for Ben J. Cope at Santa Fé, Mexico, he saw the completion of his little book "Secrets of Newspaper Reporting." His fifty pages are crammed with practical suggestions for young reporters.

One of the best chapters is that which opens the book, "Mental Equipment." In it he calls attention to the following:

Geoffrey Chaucer was a reporter of persons and events, and the introduction to his Canterbury Tales is a consummate bit of reporting. The Apostles Matthew, Mark, Luke and John—the first three perhaps more than the last—were reporters in the definite sense that one should regard the newspaper writer; they wrote of contemporary events. They were not advocates nor ponderous historians, nor analysts of metal reactions and spiritual struggle. They wrote of things that happened, and their writings were uncolored by reflection of their personalities.

The chapter "What is News?" is a contribution to newspaper literature because of the stress which the author puts upon background and so-called interesting associations. I like his description of the soul of news.

Other chapters of distinction are "Sources of News" and "The Interview." In the latter chapter he makes the somewhat startling assertion that women reporters are the best interviewers—but he does not give his reasons.

At various times Mr. Cope has been a contributor to EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He saw active service on such papers as the Rocky Mountain News, Louisville Times, and the Atlanta Georgian. In the slang of the street, his book has "guts"—enough said.

A PERSONALITY sketch of Lord Northcliffe by Don C. Seitz is printed in McNaught's Monthly for April. Mr. Seitz thus describes the first meeting:

The first time I met Alfred Charles William Harmsworth, who was later to become an international disturbance as Lord Northcliffe, he was in a bath tub at the old Holland House, on Fifth Avenue, New York. It was back in 1896, and the Daily Mail had already risen high over the horizon of English journalism. A new generation had come up in Britain since the abolition of the tax on newspapers—represented by an orange stamp on the margin that about doubled the cost to the reader. This new crowd had learned to read by firmly pressing a forefinger upon each word so it could not escape until its meaning had slowly percolated into the muddy understanding of the reader. Pleased with the illusion of knowledge, Cockney London took kindly to Harmsworth's ha'penny sheet, and he was on his way to success.

Mr. Seitz then tells how Lord Northcliffe was editor of the New York World for a day:

Harmsworth next came to New York in the last days of 1897. Brooklyn had voted to absorb New York and the union was to take place at midnight, just as the 31st of December became Jan. 1, 1898. To celebrate the occasion, for which it was largely responsible, the World took possession of City Hall Park and rejoiced outwardly with thunder and flame. For further éclat, the editor of the Daily Mail had been invited to edit our morning paper for one night only, just as he darned pleased. He elected to run the sheet in tabloid form. In solemn appreciation of the great occasion, the staff, with the exception of Pomeroy Burton, then city editor, donned evening dress. Burton refused to join in what he thought was an affectation. Curiously enough, after a few years, the meticulous Burton became a partner of Harmsworth and a baronet after the World War, leaving his birthplace, Youngstown, O., to the mercies of the Steel Trust, and declining ever to see it more.

The visitor did not get out a very good newspaper, but he cheered the place up and was good fun, while Mrs. Harmsworth, slender, black-eyed and charming, made friends with all of us. Like a good Englishman, he was clad in dinner dress and so was not out of place amid his surroundings. For one thing he talked shop with everybody. Indeed, no man ever loved his profession more, or took keener delight in talking about it.

Mr. Seitz then takes up other meetings with Northcliffe. Possibly the most interesting glimpse of Northcliffe may be found in the following quotation:

He led a terrific life. In fact he could not keep track of all the publications he either owned or had started. There were numerous failures. I recall his telling me he had launched seven successful story weeklies on re-written versions of "East Lynne" and that the most successful poster used in advertising one of them was a veiled lady in a country churchyard, tracing the worn letters on a tombstone with her slender forefinger. He was a born showman. I could not perceive that he was the least mercenary. He simply loved success and knew how to command it.

The sketches of Lord Northcliffe which have previously appeared in print have paid little, if any, attention to his visits to America. Consequently this article by Mr. Seitz fills a gap and is especially interesting to American newspaper men.

LAWRENCE VEILLER points out the way to war on crime in The World's Work for April. In doing so he pays a fine tribute to the campaign organized by the Brooklyn Daily Eagle "to help put crime out of business." The article is illustrated by reproductions of an advertisement and a cartoon which originally appeared in the Eagle.

CHEMICALS RECLAIM NEWSPRINT

Cornell Professor Announces New Ink-Removing Process

Dr. F. H. Rhodes, Professor of Industrial Chemistry at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., has evolved a successful process for removing ink from old newspapers so that they may be turned back to newsprint and used again it was announced this week. The recovered paper, Professor Rhodes says, is just as durable as the original.

The laboratory cost of the conversion is a fraction of a cent higher per pound than the present price of newsprint, due largely to the fact that newspapers can be purchased only at considerable expense. The process itself is said to be simple, consisting only of mangling paper, reducing it to pulp and then treating it with the necessary chemicals.

Business Bureau Leaves Ad Club

The Portland (Ore.) Better Business Bureau has been separated from the Portland Advertising Club. The bureau has incorporated and will be supported by sustaining members. The incorporators are Paul T. Shaw, Frank Freeman, E. N. Strong, C. C. Colt, Henry J. Frank, John Casey, A. C. McMicken, L. R. Bailey, P. C. Smith, C. J. Mathis, Will Roberts and W. B. Ryan. Robert M. Mount will continue as manager.

Tries Typesetting Innovation

The current issue of Linotype News, organ of the Mergenthaler Linotype Company, contains an experiment of interest to publishers—the running of an eight point news body face on seven point body. The result is increased legibility over regular seven point faces, with virtually no line loss, the paper states. The news body matter is 8 Point No. 2 with Gothic No. 3 set on seven point body.

AN excellent full page advertising idea was utilized recently by the students running the University of Washington Daily, Seattle, for a page of "Who's Who" among the business men in the University district. Then are run advertisements of dressmakers, musical instrument repairers, building contractors, tinters and enamelers, paperhangers, hand laundries, sign painters, etc.—Allen H. Wright.

Umbrellas are excellent sellers in March and April, just before the rainy season sets in. Here's an opportunity to get the umbrella shops to advertise their wares and to get the umbrella repairmen lined up for an insertion or two.—R. M. Campbell.

Under a heading "Now That Lent Is Past" run, in your Easter Sunday issue, a column of classified advertising from firms that handle various party accessories such as favors, place cards, tallies, table linen, etc. Florists and caterers also are likely prospects for this type of advertising. Many small shops that do not ordinarily advertise can be interested.—E. D. S.

Here is an idea to add interest to your automobile show. Have each of the dealers participating post their picture, preferably one taken in former years, in other dealers' place of business, only one picture of each dealer to be exhibited. The object is to have the public name correctly each of the dealers and tell what line of cars he sells and the location of his establishment. Then have the winner receive a credit of say $250 on the purchase price of a new car from any one of these dealers, same to be used within the following 30 days, second prize of $100 and third prize of $75 under the same conditions. Such a plan made the show here go over big.—Anton Jeppesen, Mason City (Iowa.) Globe-Gazette.

Increase Consumer Demand in

New York State

Through the Daily Newspapers

The success of manufacturers, jobbers and dealers depends on consumer demand.

Dealers cannot sell goods in greater volume than people consume them.

Jobbers can sell to the dealers only in sufficient quantity to satisfy consumer demand.

Consumer demand must be stimulated by the manufacturers in order to keep up, or increase, quantity production.

Increased business, built up by advertising, is a demonstration that consumer demand is not a fixed thing.

The discerning advertiser will secure all possible facts about a territory selected for merchandising and sales promotion. These facts must be of an intimate nature.

The local daily newspapers supply National Advertisers with territorial details and merchandising co-operation that are essential to efficient sales promotion.

These newspapers are the most intimate means by which the Advertiser may learn community requirements, and through which his message may be delivered into the homes.

"Distribution"— Ours and Yours

¶ Your distribution problems may still be under consideration.

¶ Ours were solved years ago.

¶ Back in 1837, with the first issue of The Sun, came the organization of a little force which has since grown into the small-sized army of 125 Sun Carriers with over 1,000 assistants.

¶ This is not an organization of "newsboys"—crying their wares on the streets. It is an association of responsible business men whose sole business it is to deliver the Sunpapers to the homes of Baltimore.

¶ This force of carriers and assistants assures a stable distribution of the Sunpapers—morning, evening and Sunday. Our distribution problem is solved—and we'd like to put in some of our time working with you on any problems in regard to distribution in Baltimore.

¶ The Sunpapers—morning, evening and Sunday—will cover Baltimore as thoroughly for you as they do for themselves.

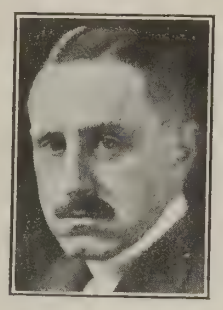
Secrecy Veils Nation's Public Business Menacing Free Press Principle

Correspondents Confused and Hampered By Disavowals of Interviews and "Official Spokesman" System—Blunders Covered at Expense of Press Reputation for Accuracy



By HENRY SUYDAM

Washington Correspondent Brooklyn Eagle

(Written for EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

SECRECY MENACE AT WASHINGTON

SECRET conduct of public business has reached scandalous proportions at Washington. By placing seals of confidence on official interviews and by audacious disavowals of responsibility when public reactions to news are unfavorable, high Government officials have succeeded in putting on the back of the press an absurd burden.

HENRY SUYDAM

What should a Washington correspondent do when a public official falsely, or by technical device, repudiates news that has been accepted and published in good faith? Should he come out with all the facts for the benefit of his readers and to clear his own newspaper of a false charge of inaccuracy? What are the ethics in this situation?

At the request of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Henry Suydam, Washington correspondent of the Brooklyn Eagle, herewith lays bare the extraordinary circumstances surrounding this menace to the press. The sincerity of this writer and the courageous independence of his newspaper are well established facts in journalism.

Manifestly, any evil condition is possible of development under veils of secrecy, and however responsible to public duty individual officials may be, the wonder is that they do not perceive the enormity of the risk when they encourage public service behind shutters. "A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position."

THE growing attempt of the Executive and Legislative branches of our Government to divest themselves of responsibility for their views and actions, and to conduct the public business in an atmosphere of anonymity and secrecy, is a development of great interest to our American press. Unless some check can be devised and applied, the present system will work incalculable harm to the reputation of our newspapers for accurate reporting. Its effect is primarily felt in our news columns, but, in a larger sense, it is threatening the very integrity of American public life. The entire situation is antipathetic to the genius of American character and Government.

The Government official who puts on a mask to hide his identity before purveying his views to the American public is not an heroic figure, nor is he inspiring of any confidence whatever. The Senator who votes to confirm a nominee and then refuses to permit his vote to become public has a curious idea of public duty. The great Federal Departments and Commissions which want to conduct public business behind closed doors bring the integrity of Government into unnecessary and even unfair disrepute.

The broad question of secrecy and evasion in the conduct of public affairs is one of such significance that it cannot be treated in this short article. As a Washington correspondent, I am more interested, at the moment, in the effect of these tendencies on newspaper work at the seat of Government, on the good name of my profession and on the reputation of American newspapers generally.

The system, as it now works, is un-American. What it amounts to is that our Government, probably without realizing its position, is actually dealing in the whole European paraphernalia of propaganda, diplomatic and otherwise, which our own statesmen so heartily condemn as alien and dangerous. The familiar tools and weapons are all being used in Washington—the trial balloons to test out sentiment, the anonymous intimations and veiled suggestions, the facile official denials when an unpopular reaction is evidenced. The time when a correspondent could ask a Cabinet member a plain question and get a plain answer, and could quote that answer, is a mere romantic memory. Such straight dealing went into the discard everywhere back in 1914, with the coming of war. The situation has now reached the point where it is practically impossible to quote any man occupying any official position. Even the merest subordinates in Government Departments glibly reel off the formula: "I'll answer your question, but I can't be quoted."

The tendency in Washington to do business in the dark has been a gradual growth, rather than a deliberate method. It has had two excellent illustrations of it in different fields. The attempt of the Department of State officially to repudiate the startling views on European Governments attributed to Mr. Alanson B. Houghton, Ambassador to Great Britain, is a case in point. Even more remarkable, although in no way analogous, is the effort, unprecedented in recent years, to keep secret the vote of the United States Senate in confirming Thomas F. Woodlock as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In both cases there was a plain purpose to keep the American public from learning the exact truth. In the first case, there was an attempt to relieve the Administration from embarrassment at the expense of the good name of the American press.

If the Senate, because of the fear of certain members to face the consequences of their votes, wants to keep secret so important a division as that confirming Commissioner Woodlock, that is a matter with which the electorate in the various States may deal. The conduct of the Executive Departments in relation to the American press is of intrinsic importance to all newspaper people, whether owners, publishers, or mere reporters.

The "official spokesman" system, as it is generally termed, was not the invention of this Administration, but blossomed out of the fertile war-time soil between 1914 and 1918. It has, however, come into full flower since 1921. It was designed primarily, and I believe with good intention, to provide correspondents informally with news that could not formally be announced. It has had great utility, and perhaps, within certain limits, still offers a useful method of contact. Its disadvantages today, however, far outweigh its advantages. When public officials can make a statement for publication, and within 48 hours officially deny having made it, it is time to call an abrupt halt.

The "White House spokesman" has more excuse for existence than any other. This peculiar contact between correspondents and the President of the United States suffers from certain drawbacks to both. Access to the President is easy. His "spokesman" confronts a large and miscellaneous group of newspaper people, many of them casual visitors unknown to the White House staff. The President's "spokesman" must therefore accomodate his discussion to the lowest common intelligence. He must be cautious of the highest factor of sensationalism present. Some reporters cover these conferences sentence by sentence, as they would a prize-fight, round by round.

I do not think it would be desirable to have the President subject to direct quotation, but I can conceive no good reason why a literal report of his remarks should not be published in the form of indirect discourse. It would insure accuracy, guard against divergent interpretations, and protect our newspapers from formal denials. The White House, which has gained an immense benefit from these twice-a-week "front page" parties, has not hesitated occasionally to deny its own words, and to thus placing its faithful newspaper courtiers, in the unhappy position of plain faking.

The "Houghton incidence" represented the absolute collapse of the "official spokesman" system. It would be unethical, under existing circumstances, to reveal the precise setting out of which this affair grew. However, Mr. Houghton had arrived in Washington from London, at the request of the President, and had reported to the President and the Secretary of State on March 17. His views, which were of so startling a nature as to attract world-wide attention, were made known to Washington correspondents on the afternoon of that day.

It was plain that the Administration was willing, for its own purposes, to have these views made known. If the authorities thought for one moment that so remarkable an indictment of European Governments would be purveyed to the American public on the mere responsibility of a group of Washington correspondents, they must have been indeed naive. The correspondents, not wanting to quote Mr. Houghton, in whose behalf the "no quotation" rule had been invoked, took the obvious, if perhaps rash expedient of phrasing the material as what Mr. Houghton had reported to the President—a representation which was true then and is true now.

When European dispatches began to pour into Washington on March 19, the Department of State issued an official denial that Mr. Houghton had revealed to any "unofficial persons"—meaning newspaper correspondents—"the nature of his report to the President." Even the literal truth of this denial, intended for European and domestic consumption, rested on a mere knife edge of terminology and definition. In a broad way, the denial was misleading and as unfair to our newspapers as anything could possibly be.

The fact was that Mr. Houghton or—shall we say?—his "spokesman" had actually divulged his mind to a group of correspondents and had told them what he told the President. If we accept the other alternative—that Mr. Houghton told the President one thing and the American public the exact opposite—Mr. Houghton is left in a rather uncomfortable position. But of course the official denial was mere absurdity.

The system of placing the seal of confidence on official interviews is a one-sided proposition. As the correspondent cannot give an authentic, word-for-word report of what is put out, nor designate the exact source, he has no protection whatever if an official disavowal is made. It would be an excellent thing sometime if correspondents thus repudiated would feel themselves free to publish the exact facts. Even after the Department of State, through an ambiguous official disavowal, attempted to place our newspapers in a false light in the Houghton affair, not a single Washington correspondent felt himself free, under newspaper ethics, to reveal the full truth. This sense of ethics appears, however, to be uni-lateral.

The cure for these existing evils has not been fully explored, but a beginning will be made when one newspaper, or a group of newspapers, refuses to accept public information on the anonymous, "no quotation," basis, and either depends on outside sources or defies an official by holding him responsible for his own statements. This would not apply to the President, who must always be allowed, in the nature of his position, a certain discretion. But it would apply to all others.

INCOME FROM SCRIPPS ESTATE WILL GO TO ADDING PAPERS TO GROUP

Publisher's Will Directs 30 Per Cent of Income Be Used for This Purpose—Robert P. Scripps Named Trustee—Million Left to Wife

THIRTY per cent of the annual income of the estate of the late Edward W. Scripps is to be used for purchasing, starting or financing new newspapers and news enterprises, it is provided in his will, which was offered for probate in Hamilton, O., March 31, by a representative of Newton D. Baker, former Secretary of War, who was its custodian. The will bears the date of Nov. 23, 1922.

The controlling stock of the new enterprises is to be held by the trust estate, of which Robert P. Scripps is named trustee. The fund can also be used for providing stock opportunities for persons in the Scripps-Howard concern. Its chief purpose is to provide a means by which the E. W. Scripps estate can continue its investments in newspapers of the Scripps-Howard concern.

Among the witnesses to the will is Roy W. Howard, who with Robert P. Scripps, is the head of the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

The will itself is a brief document. It refers to a larger instrument, however, a trust agreement which was entered into by E. W. Scripps with Robert P. Scripps as trustee, on the same day that the will was executed, and under which the properties of the former have since been controlled and administered by the latter. The purpose of the trust agreement was to prevent any hiatus or interruption in the operation of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers at the death of the founder.

Robert P. Scripps is named executor as well as trustee.

By the terms of the trust agreement, Mrs. E. W. Scripps, wife of the publisher is left the life use of Miramar, the large California ranch and winter home of the Scripps family, and annual income of $60,000 and the right to will $1,000,000 of the property of the trust estate. A daughter, Mrs. Thomas E. Meanley, of La Jolla, Cal., is left an annuity of $30,000.

An annuity of $15,000 to Miami University is for the purpose of carrying on investigations into population problems which Mr. Scripps had been financing for a number of years. Another of $30,000 goes to Science Service for the purpose of carrying on the work of that institution which Mr. Scripps founded during his lifetime and to popularize and disseminate scientific information and data throughout the country.

After minor bequests of annuities and a flat sum bequest of $25,000 to Harry L. Smithton, E. W. Scripps' secretary, the entire residuary income of the trust is left to Robert P. Scripps and his children for the life of the trust, which is to remain in existence until the death of the youngest of Robert P. Scripps' children.

No estimate has yet been placed upon the value of the estate but it is expected that this will be done in the next few weeks when letters testamentary are applied for. In case of the prior death of Robert P. Scripps, the following are appointed as trustees of the estate: Roy W. Howard of New York, Thomas L. Sidlo of Cleveland and Gilson Gardner of Washington, D. C.

Mr. Scripps died March 12, on his yacht Ohio off the coast of Liberia, Africa.

HEARST SEEKS TO BAR GANNETT'S ELECTION

Brisbane Asking Associated Press Members to Vote Againt Admission of Rochester Times-Union at Annual Meet, April 20

Arthur Brisbane, Hearst editor, is canvassing Associated Press members by letter, seeking sufficient votes to prevent election to A.P. membership of the Rochester Times-Union, owned by Frank E. Gannett. Vote will be taken in New York at the A.P. annual meeting, April 20. The Hearst newspaper in Rochester holding a protest right is the Journal & Post-Express.

A vote of 80 per cent of the membership is required to elect an A.P. member over a protest. Hearst won out two years ago, when Mr. Gannett first applied for membership. The Rochester publisher did not apply this year; the A.P. directorate asked him to join. Hearst needs the vote of 21 per cent of the membership to defeat the directors' approved candidate.

Mr. Brisbane's letter, dated March 27, followed a communication sent out by Kent Cooper, A.P. general manager, stating that the A.P. directorate unanimously approved Mr. Gannett's election and asking for favorable votes or proxies.

Mr. Brisbane's letter follows:

"Less than two years ago the members of the Associated Press, in special meeting, voted to protect their Associated Press franchises by refusing to grant memberships to Frank E. Gannett of the Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union and Van Lear Black of the Baltimore Evening Sun.

"Not satisfied with that decisive vote of the membership, the Associated Press directors are again trying to force the voting of a membership to Frank E. Gannett of the Rochester Times-Union.

"This time the proponents of Mr. Gannett hope to confuse the issue by getting you to authorize them to vote Mr. Gannett in, through your signature to the usual blanket proxy for the 27th Annual Meeting on April 20th.

"Why are the directors so anxious to give Mr. Gannett this franchise?

"There never has been a single complaint against the Rochester Journal & Post-Express, which as a member of the Associated Press is discharging faithfully and loyally its every duty to that organization.

"Why should Mr. Gannett be given a franchise for nothing that many other members have spent fortunes to obtain?

"After having so emphatically decided less than two years ago that you would not destroy the value of all Associated Press franchises, your own as well as Hearst's; and that you would not override the right of protest, are you going to allow it to be done now, under cover of a general proxy at this annual meeting?

"If you have not already sent in your proxy to the Associated Press, won't you please specify in that proxy this one exception: directing your proxy to vote against the election to membership of Frank E. Gannett of the Rochester Times-Union?

"If you have already sent in your proxy, won't you please send an amendment to the same effect to the Associated Press? Better still, won't you please sign the enclosed proxy which I am sending out to all the membership, covering merely this one question at issue, and authorizing Arthur Brisbane, Bradford Merrill or David E. Town to cast your vote against the election to membership in the Associated Press of Frank E. Gannett of the Rochester Times-Union?

"Having scotched this attempt in 1924, when your proxies were voted directly on this issue, are you going to permit this thing to be done under the cover of a general proxy for the regular annual meeting?

"If you don't want this done, please sign the enclosed proxy and send it to me in the self-addressed envelope.

"Sincerely yours,

"A. BRISBANE."

Frank B. Noyes, publisher of the Washington Star, and A.P. president, telegraphed the following statement to EDITOR & PUBLISHER on April 1:

"I can only say that after consideration extending over several years, the 14 newspaper men who act as directors of the Associated Press are unanimous in their views that the best interests of the organization will be served by the election of Mr. Gannett to membership and that they will so recommend to the membership at the annual meeting."

The next meeting of the board of directors is set for April 14.

FRIENDLY PRAISES N. J. STRIKE REPORTING

Police Clubs Unable to Deter News Men from Writing Truth He Says in Radio Address

Reporters who braved police clubs to write the truth in the Passaic strike were praised by Edwin S. Friendly, business manager of the New York Sun in the course of a radio address from station WRNY recently.

"In these United States journalism is the apostle of liberty," he declared. "I will be bold enough to say that in their newspapers our people have a champion of their rights and their freedom equal to the Supreme Court. Journalism in this land has ever and will ever stand without compromise for each and every man's right to his religious convictions, for the right to peaceable assemblage, for equal opportunity for all in the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness.

"Only in the last few weeks have we had proof of the steadfastness of our press to this principle. That proof was offered in the case of the Passaic mill strikers and their right to assemble and parade and petition in a peaceful manner without molestation. The reporters from our radical newspapers and the reporters from our conservative newspapers went over there and found that these rights were being denied or at least curtailed. Police clubs and bullying couldn't cow these reporters. They told the story and kept telling it.

"Persecution, imprisonment and even death have been used and are even now being used throughout the world to throttle the press. And to no avail. For there never was a fanatic more devoted to creed or cult than is the journalist devoted to that which we call liberty. Well indeed has the philosopher said that the liberties of the people are wrapped up in the liberty of the press and they are in safe hands."

HAYS THANKS PRES FOR FREE SPACE

"Movie Czar" Is Amazed at Amount Publicity Given to Cinema Industry Gratis—"Nothing Is More Valuable" He Admits

Will Hays, president of the Motic Picture Producers and Distributors America, Inc., this week called the pre "a very kindly and helpful big brothe to the motion picture industry, in an a dress made before the Advertising Cl of New York, March 31.

"One of the most encouraging featur of the work has been, to me, the sympat and encouragement of newspapers, lar and small, throughout the United States he said.

"Unless one realizes fully the magnitu of the motion picture industry—and t hold which motion pictures have upon t hearts of our people—it is amazing to no the amount of space which Americ newspapers give to pictures and the makers, both in their news columns and their editorials.

"Not a day passes in my office that do not receive from 50 to 100 clippin containing editorial comment about t movies—and these come in the main fro the small town papers, the little count weeklies as well as dailies.

"And I should like to say that not ing could be more valuable to me, for there is anyone who literally has his fi gers upon the pulse of the real Americ public it is the small town editor. I mig mention, incidentally, that it is my r invariably to write to each editor w comments about pictures.

"True, the newspapers, large and sma have not withheld adverse comment times, when they felt that such comme was justified. That has been helpful b cause it was sincere. On the other ha they have not withheld praise for wh ever we have done that has been wort and always their attitude has been one desire to help us toward the solution our problems."

Mr. Hays revealed that a census tak recently showed that more than 725 f mer newspaper men are now holding k position in the motion picture field.

"There used to be some humorous co ment, a few years ago," he said, "as what sort of brains were operating motion picture industry. The ansv now is 'newspaper brains'—than which, my opinion, there are none better."

The "Movie Czar" said the mov picture industry was probably spend $100,000,000 a year in advertising. T included, he said, space in newspape magazines, billboards, posters, and kinds of promotion. He advocated t postal rates on magazines and newspap should be sufficiently low to permit restricted circulation.

THOMPSON FIGHTING CONVICT LEASING EVIL

Alabama Publisher Tells Own Story of Battle Being Waged By His Four Dailies Against Present System—Says Public's Will Thwarted By Money Interests

By FREDERICK I. THOMPSON

One of the outstanding opponents of the convict leasing system in Alabama is Frederick I. Thompson, publisher of the Birmingham Age-Herald, Mobile Register and News-Item, and Montgomery Journal. Through his newspapers he has waged a bitter fight to crush the system. In response to a request from EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Mr. Thompson tells in the following article of his crusade.

IT is gratifying to learn from the request made by EDITOR & PUBLISHER that sympathetic attention is being accorded the efforts of those citizens of Alabama who are making of specific issue the abrogation of the inhuman and generally outlawed method of convict labor practiced in certain coal mines in the state. It would appear to be a matter of high importance to the good name of Alabama that decent citizens everywhere should recognize it to be an issue prosecuted by our own people and prompted by their citizenship conscience. Combatting this effort is an entrenched financial minority and a calloused political machine. Money profits to a small financial group and the spoils of office to the political machine constitute a powerful unit; and they are organized in resistance to those who place the state's good name, its morals and clean conscience before profit to the state or profit to anybody.

Frederick I. Thompson

Particularly should the press of the nation know the facts, and the invitation from EDITOR & PUBLISHER accords an opportunity gladly welcomed. The convict lease system is now an issue in Alabama. The system under which convicts are used for private profit in three of the coal mines in this state has been voted down by the people at the polls; it has been repudiated by our legislature in response to the good conscience of our citizenship. At the present moment the law empowers our governor with authority to end the whole system with a stroke of his pen. In the far and shadowy background of the system employed in the mines lurk two interests, both sinister. In their relative importance they are: those operating coal lands who want some form of bound labor, preferably with a state militia background to control a labor situation; and, second, investors in Alabama mining securities who live outside the state, who participate in profits arising from the system and who appear to harbor the delusion that citizenship absenteeism grants them immunity from the shame the profits of such a system bring to them.

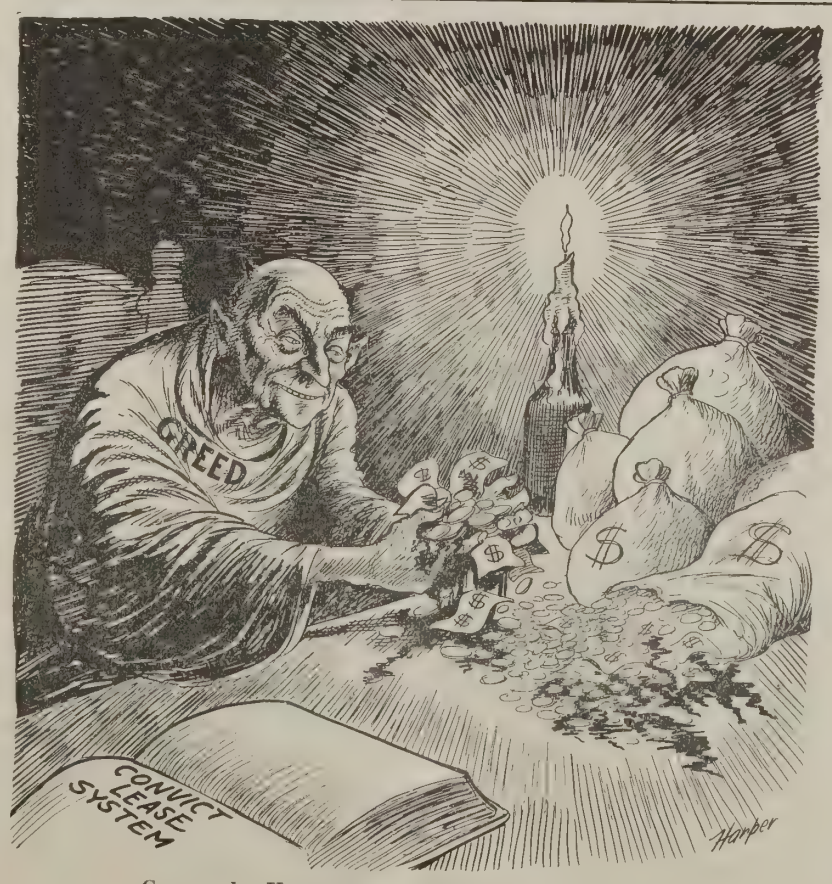
As the position taken by the newspapers published by me, the Birmingham Age-Herald, Mobile Register, Mobile News-Item, and the Montgomery Journal, information of which is requested by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, they but reflect the position that would be taken by the rank and file of men throughout our fraternity possessed of journalistic conscience and a measurable sense of that public responsibility the direction of a newspaper brings to any right-thinking man. It was clearly defined that the ending of the system could alone come from a true and impartial public presentation of the facts, it being recognized by our editorial staff that it would require an enlightened public opinion to bring about a correction of the evil in accord with that view there was published in the Age-Herald and associated newspapers more than five pages of detailed testimony of an investigation precipitated by a subpoena obtained by the Age-Herald directing the State Board of Administration, supervisor of the convict system, to produce prison records concerning the death of James Knox, a convict who died at Flat Top mining camp, whose death had been officially reported on the death certificate as one of suicide. The investigation that followed conducted by the Attorney-General developed that James Knox had died of mistreatment, and that after his death a solution of bichloride of mercury was injected into his body in an attempt to justify the death certificate of suicide. Prior to that time publication of a contemplated investigation of the circumstances surrounding the death of a prison guard at Flat Top mining camp prompted the inevitable libel suit, and opportunity was given to bring the whole issue into the light of day and clearly before the vision and the conscience of the people of the state.

The testimony resulting from the necropsy of the body of Knox, not published in full in other Alabama newspapers brought to light, in gruesome description, the punishment of the "dog-house," a coffin-like structure where men were confined until they collapsed; of a hickory stick carried by a life-term convict as boss of a gang, and used to break the bones of those rebelling against the task of digging ten tons of coal a day per man.

We sought to meet the issue squarely, best illustrated perhaps in the following extracts from a series of editorials appearing in the Age-Herald and associated newspapers:

"It is the system, this profiting in bound labor, that destroys; for it is understandable that the system prompts inhuman methods. The blame falls upon those in power who are submissive to the principle that profits are more to be considered than the state's good name* * *

"The political machine, supported by the agents of those directly participating in the profits from the system may be expected to function for the preservation of it. James Knox is dead and gone. But the system under which he died still exists. No play of words by those who seek to preserve the system; no subterfuge. no denunciation, no defense of it is going to satisfy the conscience of this commonwealth. The issue has been, and remains: how long will Alabama abuse its sovereignity either for profit to the state or profit to anybody* * *



"Those opposing the existing inhuman method will be charged with thought of politics; every charge, every innuendo, the ingenuity of those paid to defend the system can devise will be brought against those who, in good conscience and good morals, oppose it. But the public will know that it is not expression of opinion but the testimony of the witnesses, that brings the public indictment against the system; against those who continue it, and those who profit by it* * *

"It has been always, is now, and will continue to be, so long as it exists an issue solely of whether or not a penal system long since abolished by other states of the Union, shall continue to bring suspicion upon the high impulses of the citizenship of Alabama."

As desired and anticipated, a citizenship was aroused; it precipitated the issue into a pending gubernatorial campaign where finally the ending of the system must come. Aside from one candidate for Governor, who is the heir apparent of the present administration, responsible for the present continuance of the system, all of the other candidates for Governor have denounced it and pledged themselves as in favor of its abolition.

It is now believed the system has been brought to bay. The sole remaining contractors, the Sloss-Sheffield Steel and Iron Company, controlled in New York; the Alabama By-Products Corporation, a merger of local and foreign capital, and the Montevallo Coal Company, a domestic concern, may, in the absence of immediate executive abrogation clear themselves of participation by revocation of their contracts. But whether the Governor acts, or these corporations refuse to further participate in money profits arising from such a system, the sun is setting on a form of contract, repulsive to our citizenship, and degrading in its effect upon our youth.

BLOOD MONEY

Cartoon by Harper, which appeared in Age-Herald.

Donald Ewing, of the New York World staff, spent three and a half weeks in Alabama and wrote a series of 12 articles on the convict leasing system now running in the New York daily.

"It's none of New York's business," Ewing was told, when he first questioned Alabama state officials. But eventually they became more cordial and aided him in making the investigation.

Ewing, returning to New York this week, reported he was confident a clean-up would follow the forthcoming gubernatorial election.

Ewing joined the World staff in February, 1925. Prior to that he was connected with the Chicago Tribune. He started newspaper work in 1916 on the Omaha News, following his graduation from the University of Missouri. Then he joined the Associated Press until enlisting in the aviation corps for the World War. After the war, he returned to the Associated Press, Chicago office. He reported the Herrin, Ill., massacre in 1922.

Leaving the Associated Press soon after, he served for a while on the staff of the Chicago Herald Examiner, before transfering to the Tribune.

ATLANTIC CITY TIMES, NEW DAILY, TO BE LAUNCHED APRIL 11

Evening and Sunday Paper Will Absorb Ventnor News, Weekly—George F. Goldsmith Is President and General Manager

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., is to have a new newspaper. Starting with the issue of Sunday, April 11, the Atlantic City Times will launch an evening and Sunday publication.

GEORGE F. GOLDSMITH

The Atlantic City Times traces its origin back to a conference held by George F. Goldsmith, then advertising manager of the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the Philadelphia Evening Ledger and Lionel Scheuer and John D. Scheuer, owners of the Ventnor News and of the Amusement Publishing Company of Atlantic City, following which Mr. Goldsmith resigned from the Public Ledger and associated himself with the Scheuer brothers to lay the foundation for the new paper.

The new publication has been built largely around six personalities. These are Lionel and John D. Scheuer, Mr. Goldsmith, George F. Goldsmith, Jr., Francis C. Richter, managing editor, and William H. Rocap, sports editor.

The Scheuer brothers with their father, the late Charles Scheuer, founded the Ventnor News, a weekly in 1907. The Ventnor News will be absorbed by the Times. They also publish every week the Amusement Guide of Atlantic City and the Philadelphia Amusement Book. During the summer season they publish amusement guide books for Asbury Park, Wildwood and Cape May, N. J.

Closely associated with Mr. Goldsmith, who is president and general manager of the Times company, is George F. Goldsmith, Jr. After serving in the foreign advertising department of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, working out of its New York office, he went to Tokio, where for three years he was general manager of the Japan Advertiser.

A complete new plant is being erected for the production of the Times. The structure, located at North Carolina avenue and the Absecon boulevard, is 155 by 100 feet, with modern equipment and daylight lighting throughout. The foundation has been laid for six stories. The first story is being rushed to completion and the mechanical and editorial departments will be housed on this floor during the summer, the business office retaining its present downtown quarters at Atlantic and Kentucky avenues. Beginning Sept. 1, the remaining stories of the new building will be finished.

When the building is completed the mechanical department will occupy the first floor and the editorial and business departments the second, while the third and fourth will be occupied by the Amusement Publishing Company.

New equipment is being installed throughout the plant. A Goss octuple press is being erected, with Goss wet-mat stereotype equipment. Plans have been made for 16 linotypes, 11 of which are being installed now. The linotypes are equipped with electric pots and Margach feeders. In addition, a monotype type-casting and material machine and a Ludlow casting machine are being installed.

A photo-engraving plant will occupy one section of the first floor, with a photographic and art department. Ralph Myers, one of the directors will be mechanical superintendent.

Editorially the policy of the Times will be in keeping with the demands of the resort city, it was stated. Although giving attention primarily to its home field, Atlantic City, it will be a world newspaper, appealing to visitors from all over the nation to temporary residents in various cities and states, as well as to the permanent residents of Atlantic City.

The Times is a member of the A. N. P. A. and of the A. B. C.

A general news service of the International News Service and a sports and financial service from the United Press will supply the foundation for "telegraph" news. National politics will be covered by articles of Frederick Wiliam Wile and Mark Sullivan.

Especial attention will be paid to real estate, financial and sports news. The financial section will give complete daily market reports, from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore and Washington.

In sports, next to "Billy" Rocap's daily review of the spot news of sport, racing will be stressed.

The Sunday issue will contain eight pages of comics, a magazine section of local and national features and fiction, as well as the usual society section, local news and women's activities.

Francis C. Richter, Jr., managing editor, is a son of the well-known sports writer, Francis C. Richter. In addition to holding down the desk of sports editor on papers in Cincinnati, San Antonio and Philadelphia, he has been city editor of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, news editor, Philadelphia Inquirer, and night editor, Philadelphia Press.

The local staff will be under the direction of M. C. Gilbert, city editor. Mr. Gilbert resigned as news editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer to join the staff of the Times. Mr. Gilbert will also handle dramatic criticisms.

The copy desk will be headed by Guy Sullivan, for several years "in the slot" of the Philadelphia Evening Ledger.

ANTI-VICE SOCIETY CRITICISES PRESS

Newspapers Using Influence in Favor of Indecency, New York Group Declares—Says Second Class Privilege Too Easily Granted

Newspapers are using their influence in favor of indecency, the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice charged in its annual report made public last week. They are interested mainly in dollars and cents and do not wish to give offense to big amusement and publication interests, the report asserted. "Salacious and demoralizing" magazines were also attacked by the society, of which John S. Sumner is secretary.

Tabloid newspapers were characterized in the report as "a menace to any home from many angles."

Concerning other newspapers, the report says: "Real newspapers have also been gross offenders against public decency during the last year, particularly in their exploitation, as important and prominent news, of the filthy details of an annulment proceeding in a neighboring county.

"The average newspaper today lacks the character and integrity of the journal of a generation ago," the report asserts, "and many, by their editorial and news policies, are direct incentives to lawlessness. When editorial writers from day to day condone and make light of offenses against the criminal law, they cannot disclaim a partial responsibility for the epidemic of lawlessness now prevailing."

Under the title of "Magazines," the report says:

"The news stands and other places of display and sale are swamped with a mass of salacious and demoralizing periodical publications. Local efforts have been made throughout the country to improve conditions, usually through warnings from the police and prosecuting authorities. Of course such efforts are spasmodic and limited in good results.

"We believe that more could be done by the Postal and Department of Justice officials to prevent distribution of offensive matter by mail or in interstate commerce. They say, however, that no more of a preventive nature can be done as the law stands, and they are unable to suggest any helpful change in the law.

"We believe that the second-class mailing privilege on which publishers depend for low carrying cost is too freely granted. As to interstate commerce by other means than the mails, the Department of Justice does not feel called upon to investigate the nature of periodicals prior to distribution, but merely to examine complaints received after distribution, and after the damage has been done. This is not in accord with the modern idea of preventive measures to counteract harmful influences."

"FOUR A" DIRECTORS TO MEET

May Give Dinner to Publishers' Convention Week

Directors of the American Association of Advertising Agencies will meet in New York, April 10. Possibility of giving a luncheon or dinner to publishers during A. N. P. A. convention week in New York April 19-24 will be discussed, according to James O'Shaugnessy, association secretary.

Prof. Daniel Starch, director of the A. A. A. A. Bureau of Research, will discuss recently completed circulation surveys. Committee chairmen are scheduled to make important reports.

Fildes Sells Key West Call

Frank P. Fildes, publisher of the Miami (Fla.) Tribune and Palm Beach Times, who last week bought the Key West Morning Call sold that paper on March 26, to Coleman Duncan of Miami. Associated with Mr. Duncan is Charles R. Hansen, also of Miami.

AUDIT BUREAU FOR ARGENTINA DAILY'S GOAL

Jorge A. Mitre, Editor of La Nacion, Promoting Campaign for Certified Circulation Reports, and Has Inaugurated System on His Paper—In U. S. to Attend Pan-Press Meeting

ORGANIZATION in the Argentine of a body similar to the Audit Bureau of Circulations is the ambition of Jorge A. Mitre, director of Buenos Aires La Nacion. Mr. Mitre arrived in New York last week from Paris, after completing an inspection trip of La Nacion's European bureaus. At the First Pan-American Press Congress in Washington, D. C., April 7-13, he is scheduled to be one of the chief speakers. He will follow President Coolidge on the platform the first convention day. In an interview with EDITOR & PUBLISHER, he unfolded his aims for auditing the circulations of Argentine newspapers, and told of the success which had followed inauguration of other American press methods in his country in the past seven years.

"It was my first hope," Mr. Mitre declared, "that the Audit Bureau of Circulations of this country could be persuaded to come to the Argentine and establish a branch there. Such a step, I believed, would have resulted in material benefits to both the advertisers and the publishers of my country.

"I invited your Bureau to come, offering to pay all the necessary expenses. But my offer was declined. I was told that the Bureau had received similar offers from other countries, but had decided definitely upon the policy of confining their activities to the North American continent. I was disappointed, naturally, but I have not entirely given up hope that in Argentina some day there will be founded an institution at least similar to the American A. B. C."

For the present, Mr. Mitre said he has done the next best thing; he has taken a step which he hopes may eventually lead to the formation of a national newspaper and magazine circulation audit bureau in his native republic.

A little more than a year ago he began having the circulation of his own daily newspaper, La Nacion, audited. Three large accounting firms, one American, one British, and one Argentine, have been engaged. A quarterly audit is made by these firms, and the results are then made public. The three firms employed are Arturo A. Zoppi, the national public accountant; Deloite, Plender, Griffiths & Co., an American concern; and Price, Waterhouse, Saller & Co., an English company.

"Although we have been auditing our circulation only a comparatively short time, it has proved entirely successful," Mr. Mitre continued. "Business men at the start realized the value of an audited circulation.

"With the exception of one magazine, however, La Nacion is still the only publication in Argentina auditing its circulation. The newspapers issue their own circulation claims as was the case in the United States before the A. B. C. was established.

"We would welcome it if other newspapers would begin auditing their circulations."

Circulation auditing is only the most recent American publishing idea which Mr. Mitre imported from the United States and put into practice in the Argentine. He visited this country first shortly after the World War, and, after a searching study, became an enthusiastic disciple of American newspaper methods. On his return to Buenos Aires he immediately began to "Americanize" La Nacion.

While he is both editor and publisher of La Nacion, a family property, Mr. Mitre is, it appeared, chiefly interested in the editorial side of the business. When he was interviewed in the paper's New York office, of which W. W. Davies is manager, he was most enthusiastic when responding to questions of editorial character.

"The first thing I did when I returned to Buenos Aires in 1919 after visiting this country was to change the make-up of La Nacion's first page. It was the custom of my country to fill this page with advertising matter. We were first to start filling it with the most important news of each day, properly headlined, in the manner of American newspapers. Success accompanied this venture. Our circulation began almost at once to climb upwards.

"Then we brought an American newspaper advertising manager to La Nacion from New York to introduce American advertising methods. This also proved a benefit."

Mr. Mitre said he "made haste slowly" in introducing American newspaper practices. It was only nine months ago, he said, that his paper became the first in Buenos Aires to use telephones in soliciting classified advertisements.

He was told it would be disliked by Buenos Aires business men; that it would hinder rather than aid the classified business; that a newspaper might be able to obtain business by this supposedly efficient method, but that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to collect money for the advertisements so received.

Nevertheless, making up his mind suddenly, Mr. Mitre cabled an order for special telephone head-pieces to La Nacion's New York office. Ad-takers were trained in the American fashion, and the classified columns, according to Mr. Mitre, are showing a substantial increase.

Mr. Mitre said in his opinion Argentine newspaper men were today on a par with their American colleagues. A reporter, he said, is paid an average equivalent to $40 a week, which has a purchasing power in Buenos Aires of $80 a week here. The newspapers of Argentine are allowed free access to governmental news. It is very easy for the reporters to see government officials.

The director of La Nacion takes particular pride in the cable news service which it has built up in the last few years.

"We receive," he said "approximately 8,000 words of cable news every day. This may seem a small amount to an American newspaper editor, but, if he takes into consideration that the cable charges to Argentine are much higher from almost all news sources than to the United States, he may realize what this means.

"Supplementing the foreign news report of the Associated Press, we have our own correspondents in private bureaus in all European capitals."

"I see the greatest good arising from the Pan-American Congress of Journalists. Newspaper problems are universal. There is much the visiting editors may learn from their North American colleagues. And we, too, I believe, have much information to give in return."
—Jorge A. Mitre, director, Buenos Aires La Nacion.

Jorge A. Mitre

Mr. Mitre was asked, during the interview, what he thought the Pan-American Press Congress could accomplish of benefit to the two American continents.

"I see its greatest good arising simply from the contact between publishers of the North and South," he replied. "Newspaper problems are universal. By conversation and observation there is much that the visiting editors may learn from the Americans. And we, too, I believe, have much information to give in return.

"To many of the visitors, perhaps, the Congress will provide experiences, similar to those I had on my first trip, opportunities to watch American newspaper methods in operation, which might well be carried back to their home plants and introduced with success."

When in Buenos Aires, Mr. Mitre is active daily as editor of La Nacion, and during his travels he keeps in constant touch with his associates. Just before he left for Europe, he started an editorial campaign for elimination of grade crossings in Buenos Aires and the other day learned that the crusade was progressing in a very satisfactory manner.

"Buenos Aires has grown tremendously in the last few years," Mr. Mitre said, explaining the anti-grade crossing crusade. "Railroad crossings, once in country districts, now cross city streets, creating danger points and traffic problems. We also want Buenos Aires to be a city beautiful and are attacking the grade crossings on aesthetic grounds."

Mr. Mitre said all Argentine was in a prosperous condition today. As an index to the prosperity he was claiming, he pointed out that during last year $4,200,000 worth of automobiles were imported from America into his country.

"They were sold to the people of Argentine largely through newspaper advertising," he said.

Mr. Mitre said the libel laws of his country were very reasonable. They were not, he said, as strict as they are in America or Great Britain. It is very hard to collect damages against a newspaper he pointed out, if the newspaper prints a retraction. The plaintiff must prove actual injury as a result of the publication of a libel to collect from a newspaper, he added.

For the last 13 years, Mr. Mitre has been the directing editor of La Nacion. Before taking over this important post he spent four years in various sub-departments, learning the newspaper business.

On this present trip, he intends to remain in the United States a month.

Stanley Clague, director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations at Chicago, telegraphed EDITOR & PUBLISHER:

"We informed La Nacion that we regretted we could not extend the activities of the bureau to the Argentine. But, in 1923, we co-operated with J. A. McNeil, circulation manager of La Nacion, who was then endeavoring to establish an audit bureau in Buenos Aires."

OTHER DELEGATES ARRIVE

Buenos Aires La Prenza's Editorial Treatment Described

Thoroughness in treating all news and editorial topics is characteristic of leading South American newspapers, according to J. B. Powers, assistant South American manager of the United Press, who reached this country this week to attend the Pan-American Press Congress in Washington. On the same boat with Mr. Powers were Dr. Maximo Soto Hall, representing Buenos Aires La Prensa and Conrado Eggers Lecour, of Buenos Aires La Razon, delegates to the congress.

"Many South American newspaper editors are so serious in their editorial viewpoint that they would consider the average North American manner of handling an editorial page slap-dash," Mr. Powers said.

"La Prensa, for instance, has a staff of 10 men who do nothing but write editorials. Each of these editorial writers is a specialist on one subject. There are political specialists, specialists in foreign affairs, and on legal, medical, and general scientific matters. An editorial writer is allowed a week or more to prepare one editorial.

"Editorials in La Prensa are not confined to one page. The leading editorial is the first reading matter in each day's paper, following after the first few pages which are given over to classified advertising.

The same thoroughness applies to the handling of news stories. La Prensa averages every day from 80 to 100 columns of from 12 to 15 pages of solid reading matter."

Dr. Soto Hall, La Prensa's delegate, is an editorial writer who specializes on Latin-American affairs and archeology.

He was a delegate to the last Pan-American Conference held in San Diego, Cal. Mr. Lecour is pro-secretary of the editorial department of La Razon, important evening newspaper of Buenos Aires.

SPORT PICTURES HAVE WIDEST APPEAL ROTO EDITOR'S SURVEY SHOWS

Movie and Theatrical Views Rank Second In Appeal, News and Educational Tied For Third—Says Local Personality Portraits of Limited Appeal

By E. LESLIE WATHEN

Rotogravure Editor, Buffalo Courier

WHEN rotogravure pictorial sections made their first bow to the public it was an easy task to find plenty of good photographic material, but in the past six years the demand for photographs for use on the daily picture pages has caused roto editors no end of worry and trouble. It is not unusual for an editor to have a batch of photos selected for a page and then pick up a noon edition of one of the dailies and see several of the pictures he had selected that morning in print.

You say, "Why not subscribe to a photo service that can give him exclusive pictures?" The answer is, "He does." But anything of real importance is covered by every photo service in the country.

The photographers all get the same pictures, though usually from different angles. The greater part of photographs, supplied by services, that can be used in roto are what may be termed, "feature pictures." Under this heading may be mentioned such pictures as: The recently completed allegorical bronze doors by Pompeo Coppini; the female Gompers; the U. S. S. Detroit up for repairs; spectacular ice skating at St. Moritz; prize greyhounds; gaudily striped suspenders for milady, etc., etc. Few if any news pictures can be used in roto due to the length of time in preparation, which is from ten days to a week in advance of the date of publication.

Now comes the question, "What kind of pictures should the rotogravure editor use?" No one person can give a definite answer to this question because conditions vary in the different cities. However, I am going to submit to readers of EDITOR & PUBLISHER my own views on the subject of pictorial copy. In the first place, I believe the various classes of photographs and their effect on the reading public should be carefully analyzed. I have tried to find out what kind of pictures interest the greatest number of readers through the use of questionnaires and personal tests. On the questionnaires I listed the following classes of pictures and asked the readers to mark their choice with an "X": News pictures, scenic views, art (paintings, sculpture, etc.), educational, sports, theatrical and movie, baby pictures, and at the end of the column a blank space was provided for subjects not already mentioned.

The personal test was conducted as follows: I would hand a batch of pictures containing one picture of every classification I could think of to any person who might chance to come to my office. I also tried it on personal friends, and asked them to select the picture they were most interested in. While they were looking through pictures I also noted which one they looked at the longest. The results of these tests were: Sports, first place; Movie and Theatrical pictures, second place; News and Educational pictures were tied for third place. The results were quite logical when you consider that nearly every one is interested in some form of sport and that every city and village has one or more movie theaters that are packed to the doors at every performance. News and educational pictures satisfy the people's curiosity by showing them actual pictures of the events of the day and of discoveries of science they have read about in the daily news dispatches. A page of pictures we ran of King Tut-Ankh-Amen's coffin and mask, the first released by the Egyptian government, is my idea of an A-1 rotogravure feature and I don't think I exaggerate when I say that this particular feature had 100 per cent reader interest.

Rotogravure editors have to use a certain number of page features, but these features must be of more or less general interest. For example, the following topics treated as page features are of general interest to the greatest majority; Motor tours (summer feature); Fashions; Art exhibitions; Pets; Radio stars; Points of interest at.....(Some place within easy reach of your city); A Day in a Movie Studio; To the North Pole by Air; etc. Pages carrying baby pictures and snaps of men about town are too personal to have any great value. Your appeal is limited. We will suppose that at a fair average 20 people are interested in each individual shown on a page, and suppose there are 20 such pictures on a page, that would give you 400 interested readers. To go further, say 1,000 people were actually interested and your Sunday circulation is 100,000 or more. That means that 99,000 people skip over this page of personalities. Then consider in the case of baby pictures the mothers who are slighted because their baby's picture was not large enough to suit them, or it should have been placed at the top because it was much better looking than the picture of Mrs. Smith's "kid." Then the mothers you have pleased find fault because the picture had some grease smeared on it or the corner was torn. In return for your efforts you stand to lose 9 to 1 rather than make any circulation gain. This is to say nothing of the thousands who say, "I don't see why they should fill the paper with children's pictures," and, "Who cares about other people's kids." Local group pictures of baseball teams, clubs, societies, banquets, etc., can be used to good advantage in the back pages of the section and as fillers when you are short of material. Groups must be treated in accordance to the size and importance of the organization or event. The use of too many group pictures in one issue is a mistake.

E. Leslie Wathen

The personality ruling does not apply to all newspapers, but it does apply to papers with a circulation of 100,000 or more. Smaller newspapers find that playing personalities helps build and gain friends, but the larger publications have to be metropolitan in their pictorial policy. The roto editor should analyze his field and determine what class of picture will interest the majority. Take the Palm Beach Post for instance, its appeal is society and real estate. Each paper has its own problems.

Papers in cities such as New York, Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, Buffalo, etc., have to, or should, have a ruling on what personalities rate space in their rotogravure sections. Persons of no consequence should not be pictured in rotogravure just because they have read your paper for the past 10 or 20 years, or because they will purchase ten extra copies of the paper and send them to their friends in Squedunk or some place that does not concern you.

The best formula to build circulation through the rotogravure supplement is first: An interesting variety of pictures of general, and second, a well printed section. This is accomplished by insisting that your roto plant produce quality work. There is nothing worse than a poorly printed rotogravure section.

This is the second of a series of articles on rotogravure written by E. Leslie Wathen exclusively for EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

HISTORY OF CLASSIFIED AUTHOR LOSES SUIT

Court of Appeals Dismisses $25,000 Action Against N. Y. Telegram—Right of Writer to His Work Involved

ALBANY, N. Y., March 30.—An unusual case involving the rights of a writer to the product of his talent as opposed to those of his employer, was argued before the Court of Appeals today in the appeal of E. Rodgers Sylvester from a decision of the lower courts dismissing his complaint against the New York Herald Company, publisher of the New York Telegram, to recover $25,000 damages for an alleged libel.

At the request of his employer Sylvester wrote "The Story of Classified Ads," which was published by the Telegram as a pamphlet and advertised for sale as having been written by Gilbert N. Gundersen, classified manager of the Telegram.

His counsel, Otto C. Sommerich, argued that although the story became the property of the employer, by reason of making a false statement as to its authorship, Sylvester had been deprived of the opportunity of claiming it as his work, or of establishing a reputation as a writer; that there is an implied understanding that the work of an employee shall not be falsely attributed to another, and if done there is a liability in damages.

Justice Black, in dismissing the case, held that since the plaintiff's name was not mentioned and since the public did not know him to be the author of the article the false statement of authorship did not constitute a libel for which damages could be assessed.

R. O. Willguss appeared as attorney for the New York Herald Company.

International Buys Lumber Company

The International Paper Company has purchased the Stanne Lumber Company of Toronto from Norwegian interests. The consideration was approximately $300,000. International has also taken options on further private limits in eastern Ontario.

125 Carriers Taken on Trip

The St. Paul Dispatch-Pioneer Press management March 28 gave 125 of the 348 carriers of those papers an "educational tour" to Duluth, Superior, Wis., and along the North Shore of Lake Superior. The 125 had won the excursion trip by canvassing in their spare time for new subscribers.

AMERICAN TOBACCO CO. HAD RECORD YEAR

Net Earnings of $22,285,596 Reported for 1925, an Increase of $1,448,902 Over Previous Year—Newspapers Form Backbone of Advertising

By FRANK HARWOOD

Advertising Manager, American Tobacco Company

(Last year was a banner year in the history of the American Tobacco Company. Net earnings for 1925 were $22,285,596, a new high record. There was an increase in earnings of $1,448,902 over the previous year. The company invested more than $2,000,000 in newspaper space. Mr. Harwood this week contributes the second article to a series obtained by EDITOR & PUBLISHER on the question: "Why I make newspapers the backbone of my campaign.")

Newspaper advertising brings in the business.

In a single sentence that is the American Tobacco Company's explanation of the fact that the newspapers are the media forming the backbone of each year's advertising program. Magazines, billboards, electric signs, and other forms of sidered simply publicity are consupplementary media.

FRANK HARWOOD

Persistency stands in first place in our company's advertising credo. To carry out that belief, the place to turn, we have decided, is to the newspaper. The newspaper delivers daily value to the advertiser.

To be worth while at all, advertising must be done consistently. The competitive tobacco field makes the building of brands a slow process. Not only to increase the volume of business, but also to insure the volume already obtained, brand names must be kept constantly before the public.

The public's constant companion is the newspaper. To meet and talk with the public daily, what is better than for an advertiser to go to the public through the doorway of the newspaper column, which opens up into the nation's homes?

Whether used in localized promotion or as the basis of a national campaign, the newspaper furnishes efficient service. Some 2,000 newspapers, including weeklies, carry our frequent messages to the smoking public. The results we have obtained and are continuing to obtain are cheap at the price such advertising costs.

We are entirely satisfied.

A. P. TRAFFIC CHANGES

New Market Service Completed—Printers for Various Members

Completion of wire facilities providing a new two-hour market service for Associated Press members was announced this week by Milton Garges, traffic superintendent. The market wire parallels virtually the entire A. P. trunk system and extends approximately 10,000 miles, Mr. Garges said.

Previously market reports were sent at about four o'clock daily over the regular night wire. As a result of the new system, leading newspaper members are being furnished complete stock tables 45 minutes after the close of the New York Stock Exchange at 3 o'clock, it is claimed.

North Carolina members taking the night A. P. report effective some time next month will be connected by double circuit, a Morse wire being paralleled with a high speed printer. The same service is also being installed in Georgia and in Pennsylvania connecting big member dailies.

STEWART SAYS P. O. DEFICIT WILL BE $31,000,000

Joint Congressional Commission Resumes Hearings—New Urges Lower Third and Fourth Class Rates, With Newspaper Class Unchanged—Publishers' Representatives to Testify

By BART CAMPBELL

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WASHINGTON, April 1.—Postoffice department officials anticipate a deficit of approximately $31,000,000 by the end of the current fiscal year (July 30) according to testimony given this week before the joint congressional postal commission created to handle the postal rate problem.

This estimate of expenditures exceeding receipts developed during the testimony of Joseph Stewart, special executive assistant to Postmaster General Harry S. New. Mr. Stewart figured postal receipts for the current fiscal year will not exceed $676,000,000, while expenditures will total $707,000,000.

Mr. New did not appear before the commission when it resumed hearings Tuesday. Instead, Mr. Stewart presented the department's recommendations for revision of postal rates.

Spokesmen for the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and the National Editorial Association were on hand, but Mr. Stewart consumed so much time in submitting an array of figures to support the department's recommendations that they were forced to wait until Friday and Saturday to take the stand.

One significant feature of the department's statement was the Postmaster General's opposed reduction in rates on third and fourth class mail matter. No recommendation was made for or against any change in second class postage rates. Mr. New did, however, recommend reduction in the rate of transient second class mail matter which consists of newspapers and magazines mailed by the public. His recommendation is the rates be reduced from two cents to one cent for each two ounces, regardless of distance carried.

Although this week's hearings were primarily a continuation of those held last summer and fall by the commission, special consideration was given the McKellar bill recently introduced in the Senate, which among other provisions, includes restoration of the 1920 schedule of rates on second class mail.

All classes of publishers are agreed on the program for the 1920 schedule of rates which would make special reductions in rates on advertising portions of publications in all zones.

Senator McKellar (Democrat), of Tennessee, a member of the commission and author of the bill, expressed the belief the increased postal rates ordered under the act of 1925 are responsible for the falling off in receipts. He also told EDITOR & PUBLISHER he is confident his bill will receive favorable consideration.

Considerable surprise was manifested at the action taken by the commission in barring Richard H. Lee, attorney for the National council of business mail users, from further appearance before it. Mr. Lee is director of the national campaign of the council which represents direct mail organization and parcel post shippers.

The commission based its action upon a letter written by Mr. Lee to some of his associates, in which he urged them to carry on a letter-writing campaign on behalf of lower postage rates. The chief objection to Lee's activities was the allegation that he asked his associates to write "nasty letters" to senators and congressmen in an effort to get action on postal rate revision at this session.

The direct mail and parcel post organizations have stated that they will have their representatives present their case direct to the commission. It was explained that the barring of the attorney for the third and fourth class users affected Lee personally and not the council.

The Lee letter was mailed from New York, it was stated, and accused Senator Moses, chairman of the commission of delaying action on legislation in an effort to prevent rate revision this session.

Senator Moses read the letter and explained Mr. Lee had been barred in executive session of the commission by an unanimous vote.

The Postmaster General recommended to the Special Joint Sub-committee on Postal Rates of Congress, the following:

That the rate on post cards be restored to 1 cent each.

A new and important recommendation that legislation be enacted providing for a "C. O. D. post card." Such legislation would authorize the Postmaster General to accept for transmission in the mails business reply cards under conditions prescribed by him at postage thereon at the regular rate for post card and an additional postage charge of not more than 2 cents on each card to be collected on delivery to the original mailer. Provision is made for safeguarding the compensation and allowances to the various classes of postmasters. It is estimated that such a system will result in a material increase in postal revenues, and furnish another postal facility of special importance and advantage to the public.

The Postmaster General makes another recommendation on a matter which was not covered in the act of 1925.

"The law requires that mail matter of the first class upon which one full rate of postage has been prepaid must be forwarded to destination," the report read. "This requirement is taken advantage of by a number of concerns by mailing heavy first class matter with deficient postage. This failure to prepay the postage not only causes an additional handling by both clerical and carrier forces, but requires more time for handling and delivery and consequently entails additional expense and labor. It is recommended that in such cases if the postage is short only one rate the deficient postage only shall be collected, but if short more than one rate the deficient postage and an additional charge of 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof shall be collected.

"The act of 1925 made certain changes in rates on second class mail matter, including that applying to transient second class, so-called, that is, publications entered as second class when sent by others than publishers or newsagents. These are the publications sent by the public to friends, etc.

"The act increased the rates for such matter, making them 2 cents for each 2 ounces or fraction for weights not exceeding 8 ounces and for weights for matter exceeding 8 ounces the parcel post rates to apply.

"The Postmaster General did not recommend this rate and points out that the increase is excessive and has reduced the mailings of this class of matter largely and the revenue of the Department accordingly.

"He therefore renews his recommendation made in November that the rate be fixed at 1 cent for each 2 ounces, regardless of distance carried.

"The Postmater General shows that the rates on third class matter and on fourth class matter fixed by the act of 1925 have approximately produced the results expected by the Congress in raising additional revenue from them. He therefore believes that there should be no change made in the rates for these classes.

"The Postmaster General makes no recommendation for changes in registry, insurance, collect-on-delivery, return receipts, special delivery and money orders, but makes a recommendation for an important change in regard to the special handling charge. At present this charge does not cover special delivery of the article. He recommends that the terms of the provision be enlarged so as to insure special delivery as well as special handling and that the rates be graduated on the basis of weight, the new rates to range from 15 to 35 cents. There is a special exception with regard to the higher rate and where the mailer does not wish special delivery he may have the special handling at the rate of 25 cents."

ASKS PROBE OF OBSCENE MATTER IN MAILS

Rep. Elliott Offers Resolution Calling for Investigation by Six Members of Congress to Sift Charges

A Congressional investigation of the alleged circulation and transportation of obscene, indecent, and lascivious written printed and pictorial matter was requested in a House resolution presented March 30 by Rep. Richard N. Elliott, of Indiana.

The resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, read as follows:

"Resolved, That a joint committee is hereby created, to be composed of three members of the Senate to be appointed by the President of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Such joint committee shall conduct an investigation to determine the truth or falsity of allegations which have been made that obscene, indecent, and lascivious written, printed, and pictorial matter has been and is being circulated through the mails and transported in interstate commerce, and to determine the advisability of enacting remedial legislation. The joint committee shall report its findings to the Congress together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

"The joint committee is authorized to hold hearings and to sit and act at such places during the sessions and recesses of the present Congress, to require by subpoena and otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service in reporting such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. Subpoenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman. The expenses of the joint committee shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate, and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers signed by the chairman."

PICTURE RATES INCREASED

Underwood & Underwood and International Announce New Prices

Underwood & Underwood, Inc., New York photographers, this week announced a new price schedule showing increased rates to daily and Sunday newspapers. International Newsreel is also boosting prices, but would not specify what the new charges would be when questioned by EDITOR & PUBLISHER. Queries made to other picture syndicates brought replies that they intended to keep prevailing rates, for the present at least.

The new U. &. U. price schedule, which became effective April 1, lists a minimum charge to daily and Sunday newspapers for publication in news sections of $5, an increase of $2 over the old charge. The minimum charge to rotogravure sections is now listed at $10, compared with $5. The International schedule, effective April 1, is understood to be similar on these items.

Frank A. Eaton, manager of the news picture division of U. & U., said the price boost was due to increased and unavoidable production costs.

"Although the cost of obtaining, manufacturing and distributing news pictures has more than doubled in the last 10 years, selling prices of such pictures have remained the same," he pointed out.

Wide World Photos Inc., Acme Newspictures, and P. & A. Photos Inc., will maintain present rates, EDITOR & PUBLISHER was told. Kadel & Herbert stated they were undecided whether to increase prices or not.

Underwood & Underwood's new schedule also lists the following: to weekly and monthly magazines, $5; to trade papers, house organs, and religious publications, $3; to book publishers, $5; to advertisers for use in advertisements, $10; to artists for sketch purposes, $3; for personal use, $1; for mat services, $5.

BUFFALO PAPERS' LINAGE

Clerical Error Showed February Business Running Behind 1925

A clerical error in the compilation of February, 1925-1926, newspaper linage figures for 30 cities by the New York Evening Post Statistical Department indicated that the 1926 total for Buffalo was considerably less than that for 1925. The compiler had compared February figures with those for January, instead of the records for February, 1925. The correct figures, as reported by DeLisser Brothers, follows:

Paper	1926	1925	Gain
Courier	521,920	555,466	33,546*
Express	418,642	382,390	36,252

SEEK TO BAR PUBLISHERS

Postoffice Department Objects to Their Intervention in Mail Rate Case

The Postoffice Department asked the Interstate Commerce Commission, March 29, to decline to give the American Newspaper Publishers' Association the right to intervene in proceedings instituted by railroads for increased mail transportation rates.

To grant the publishers' petitions, the department said, would be to divest the Postmaster General of the discretion conferred upon him by law.

The publishers have asserted that the commission is without power to prescribe postal rates for the handling of newspapers and that such rates should be considered by Congress.

K. C. STAR BID NOT FILED

Haldeman-Julius $8,000,000 Tentative Price May Be Larger, He Says

E. Haldeman-Julius, Girard, Kan., publisher, has prepared a tentative proposal to the trustees of the Kansas City Star for the purchase of the paper under a plan which would turn part of the profits to civic art for Kansas City and provide a fund for education and teaching journalism and care and support of persons now or formerly engaged in journalism.

Mr. Haldeman-Julius says his $8,000,000 bid for the purchase of the Star has not been filed with the trustees and that the formal offer may be for a larger sum.

The Girard publisher is mailing his proposal to the trustees of the Star.

TRAIL BLAZERS OF ADVERTISING

St. Paul's Old Brilliant Carnival

by Chalmers L. Pancoast

COPYRIGHT 1925 BY EDITOR & PUBLISHER CO.

CHAPTER XXXIX

St. Paul's Old Brilliant Carnival

MOUNTED cowboys in full regalia shot up the town, even carrying their pistols filled with blanks into the State Legislative Chamber; Indians and buckaroos and brass bands paraded, joining in noise battles with the hundred or more drum corps.

The St. Paul, Minn., Winter Carnival, usually held the last week in January, was ruled over by Boreas Rex 2nd, King Cole, selected by the public to keep the great event filled with the carnival spirit. He was attended by the Queen of the Carnival, dozens of beautiful princesses, and dignitaries, all appearing in elaborate costumes.

They officiated at the Queen's Palace, ice rinks, toboggan slides, ski slides; and the thousands of gaily costumed subjects joined enthusiastically in paying homage to their King and Queen.

Every business and social organization and secret society had marching clubs. The members of these clubs were all costumed differently, and as strikingly as possible. There were all colors and combination imaginable, brilliant shades predominating.

Each Club had its Queen, selected by popular vote in the club. They usually wore white, red, purple or green cloaks of various materials, trimmed with white fur, to distinguish them from the rank and file of the girl marchers in the regular carnival uniforms.

These clubs sallied forth at all hours of the day and night with a blare of trumpets and the beating of drums. The big event in each club was the crowning of the Queen. During big street parades the Queens usually rode in beautifully decorated sleighs or toboggans.

The principal street corners were decorated with 25-foot Totem Poles, which were dedicated on the opening day with great ceremonies. On this day all business was suspended to enable everyone to enter the parade of marching clubs, which was the largest demonstration of its kind ever held in this country.

More than 15 toboggan slides scattered throughout the city, furnished thrills. These slides ranged from diminutive single alleyed affairs, several hundred feet long, to double slides more than a half mile long. Dozens of skating rinks were provided for public skating, and then, there were skating contests, skiing contests, drum contests, and in fact some sort of a contest for every sport.

Perhaps the most interesting club taking part in the carnival, was the Cherokee Heights Indian Club. The men wore the costume of the Cherokee Indians and their faces were stained a deep brown. When the men were marching on the streets behind them trudged the children attired in brown leather with faces stained, and behind the children walked the mothers, also wearing brown leather. In true Indian fashion, the families of this club went about the city in single file with the "squaws" always last. They staged pow-wows frequently on street corners and in hotel lobbies. On one occasion Chief "Lone Pine" of the Umatilla Reservation in Oregon was guest of honor at a street corner pow-wow and a "greaser" was burned at a stake. War dances were given and other stunts which only the imitators of the Cherokees knew how to perform.

Every club had its own drum corps, each corps seemingly trying to drown out all others in the matter of rattle and crash. More than 75 corps paraded the streets at all hours of the day and night and it sounded like all St. Paul was going to war or just returning from a victorious battle.

Cowboys with big guns in holsters dangling from their sides, garbed in the costumes of the far West, astride prancing horses, were the center of attraction. The cheers, whoops and pistol shots of these buckaroos from Pendleton, Ore., and Havre, Mont., was one of the big sensations of the Carnival. These cowboys performed real wild-west stunts by lassoing girls on the streets, especially the Carnival Queens, and making tenderfeet dance to a pistol accompaniment, and riding wherever they pleased.

It was like frontier days around St. Paul and it was not a place for nervous or excitable people. The buckaroos were equipped with six shooters and ample blank cartridge ammunition. They fired their guns on every occasion.

The big feature of the carnival festivities was the professional championship ski jumping. New records were made in jumping which provided exciting sport and many thrills for the spectators. Many of the skiers claimed the new steel slide was faulty in construction which caused many bad spills and thereby provided more thrills.

Tossing people up in blankets was forbidden by the Chief of Police, but it was enjoyed so by the merry-makers that various marching clubs had their squad of tossers who were always looking for victims in the crowds.

All sorts of curious sights were to be seen, especially in store windows and along streets. The slogan of the Carnival was "Make It a Hotter One." This phrase was illustrated by one store that displayed a big coal stove out in front on the sidewalk. It was painted red and looked as though it were red hot. The contrast between this glowing stove surrounded by much snow was striking and attracted much attention.

Day and night the people of St. Paul watched the longest dog derby ever staged in the world, as it was hourly recorded on a large public bulletin board.

The route from Winnipeg, Canada, to St. Paul, 516 miles, was marked with red lines showing the position of each racer and the time of the last news was also indicated.

The idea of the race was originated by Louis W. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway and also president of the Outdoor Sports Carnival. Many years ago the late James J. Hill, of railway fame, drove from Winnipeg to St. Paul over about the same trail as did the racers of the Northern woods with their huskies, and it was with this in mind that Louis W. Hill started negotiations to stage the race which proved the great sensation of the St. Paul Winter Carnival.

The giant baked potato float

Fred Hartman, an unknown prospector who hunted for gold in Alaska, became a hero in this 516 mile dog derby race. Hartman came in last in the race, but his pluck, grit and never-give-up spirit won for him the greatest honor of the race.

He lost his lead dog at the beginning of the race and had to walk or run the entire 516 miles, while the other racers rode. He slept one hour in every six and "mushed" in the dead of night while the other racers slept. He had to make his own trail in snow five feet deep in places and it was 30 degrees below zero. His heroic efforts to win the race won the hearts of the people of the Northwest and he received "Hero Purses" along the route which amounted to more money than the first prize. He froze his face and feet, and when he crossed the goal was so exhausted he dropped in his tracks. The crowds crowned him a hero and acclaimed him more than they did the winner.

One form of old-time advertising which never seemed to lose its big appeal was the industrial float built especially for carnivals, fairs and all sorts of public spirited occasions.

When 75,000 people will stand out in a snowy, biting wind with the thermometer at 20 below zero and cheer the floats in a parade, the floats have merit as advertisements with strong pulling power.

This was what happend at the industrial pageant held in St. Paul during the Outdoor Sports Carnival.

The principal reason the advertising float never failed to interest was cause of the opportunity it offered for originality and artistic conception of article or concern being advertised. N ther paint, paper nor car advertising produce the startling effects that can secured by designers, artists, carpent and pretty girls.

When 75,000 spectators braved weather there had to be something sides wood, canvas and paint to hold th attention. The Carnival Queens w mixed in with the floats and just enou to enhance their advertising value, a to make them more animated. WHEN ARE LIBELLOUS STATEMENTS PRIVILEGED?

Documents Filed in Clerk of Court's Office Sources of Libel Unless Used Openly in Public, Official and Judicial Proceedings—Can You Confess to Something You Are Acquitted of Doing?

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"Big Tim" Sullivan, late Tammany boss, is quoted as saying:
"My advice is never to sue for libel. A newspaper may prove that the allegations against you are true."

But allegations exist which a newspaper would have difficulty in proving should libel litigation follow their publication. Carl Helm, of the Hearst Bureau of Libel Survey, calls attention to the fact that documents filed in the County Clerk's office, or in the office of a clerk of the court are not privileged, and that editors in using such documents are inviting libel suits, difficult to defend.

This is the third article of a series obtained by Editor & Publisher stripping the libel law of legal verbiage.

EDITORIAL ignorance of libel law, or plain recklessness, is leading newspapers of the nation almost daily over a dangerous highway paved with damage suits, according to Carl Helm, lawyer and former newspaper man, now a member of the Hearst legal department in New York. Mr. Helm was assigned recently by William A. DeFord, general counsel of the Hearst Corporations, to study the causes of libel suits, and he has summarized his findings in interviews with the writer of this series.

The dangerous highway to which Mr. Helm refers this week is the publication of documents filed in the County Clerk's office, or the office of a clerk of the court.

Such documents are not privileged, but it is the general custom among editors, according to Mr. Helm, to take a chance and print them.

"In most states," Mr. Helm said, "these documents are not privileged unless they are used openly in the course of a public and official or judicial procedure. It is generally even against court rules to permit anyone except the parties concerned or their legal representatives to look at these documents.

"A newspaper reporter, however, hears that a suit has been filed. He looks up the attorney in the case and from him obtains a carbon copy of the complaint. The attorney in so doing is violating the ethics of his profession, but many are willing to furnish the copy for the publicity they expect and do receive.

"The carbon copy is taken to the editor. It looks very safe. The statements are alleged to be verified and sworn to. The editor 'jumps aboard' and prints it, forgetting apparently that if the suit is withdrawn before it gets into open court, he will be left holding the bag.

"Procedure of this sort is particularly dangerous in the case of divorce suits.

"There are only absolute defenses of libel, namely, justification and privilege. The defense of justification is that the libellous article was true.

"Suppose, however, that a man sues his wife for divorce. In the complaint filed with the court clerk he cites several concrete cases of adultery against his wife. It is a big scandal story. The newspaper wants to print the story first, and before the complaint is used openly in court, the reporter obtains the carbon copy from the husband's lawyer. The story is published. Then, before trial, the principals become reconciled.

"Where does that leave the newspaper? There is only one defense for publication of this libel—that is the truth. The newspaper's lawyer must prove the allegation of adultery, certainly a difficult defense particularly after the couple concerned has become reconciled."

A reconciliation case of this sort recently came before the Supreme Court in New York. A woman sued her husband for divorce, named another woman as co-respondent, and then dropped the suit without giving the other woman a chance to defend her good name. Had the newspapers given publicity to the case when the complaint was filed with the court clerk, the co-respondent might have successfully sued for libel.

This suppositious case, which approaches actuality too frequently for comfort, naturally calls for a precise answer to the question: When are libellous statements privileged?

A memorandum entitled "Look Out for Libel," drafted for the guidance of the editorial and publishing staffs of Hearst newspapers and issued by the order of the Executive Council of the Hearst Corporations, states:

"The defense of privilege is that the article constituted a fair and true report of what transpired at, or with respect to, any judicial, legislative or other public and official proceeding.

"Statements by public officials, such as judges, district attorneys, that are not made openly during the actual conduct of a public and official or judicial proceeding, and as a part thereof, are no more privileged than the statements of a private person.

"Any testimony ordered stricken from the record ceases to be privileged matter.

"A newspaper is as responsible for the publication of a charge which it quotes one person as making against another, as if it made the charge without quotation, assuming that the matter quoted was not privileged."

Section 337 of the New York Civil Practice Act, under the heading "Proof of Malice in Action for Libel," reads:

"An action, civil or criminal, cannot be maintained against a reporter, editor, publisher, or proprietor of a newspaper for the publication therein of a fair and true report of any judicial legislative or other public or official proceedings without proving actual malice in making the report.

"This section does not appy to a libel contained in the heading of the report or in any other matter added by any person concerned in the publication, or in time and place of the public and official proceedings which was not a part thereof."

Recently in New York there was a story telling of a school boy's alleged beating by his teacher. The story originated in a magistrate's court, but a reporter was sent to interview the boy, confined to his bed, supposedly as a result of the beating.

"There were many interesting things, of course, which the boy might tell the reporter and which the newspaper might print. Reporter and newspaper, however, simply invite libel if they quote the boy making the direct charge of beating, against his teacher. You can say the same thing and be just as sensational if you put the charge where it was publicly and officially made, that is to the Magistrate, who was undoubtedly told of the beating when the warrant for the arrest of the teacher was obtained.

Confessions made by alleged criminals to detectives, Mr. Helm also pointed out, may boomerang back into a newspaper's lap in the form of a libel suit. Sometimes the intriguing question arises: "Can you 'confess' to something you are acquitted of doing?"

"It is a safe rule to remember that the publication of a rumor, even when it is based on information obtained from a detective assigned to the case, who claims he has the alleged criminal's confession, that a person has been guilty of misconduct is as libellous as the direct charge that he has been guilty of misconduct," Mr. Helm said. The phrases, 'It is said,' 'It is alleged,' 'It is reported' do not in any way mitigate the effect of libellous matter.

"Not very long ago in the case of an alleged absconder a confession was made to a detective that the defendant stole $25,000 in order to make a splurge with his sweetheart. The confession became a part of the court record and was safe enough at the time of initial publication.

"The alleged absconder, however, was acquitted.

"Some time afterwards the same defendant got into other trouble—this time in a breach of promise suit brought by that same sweetheart. Naturally a newspaper man would want to use that previous confession. But in so doing he would, unless he were extremely cautious about it, lay his paper open to a difficult libel suit.

"The original confession as printed at the time of trial quoted the defendant as saying that his desire to make a hit with his sweetheart 'made me steal the $25,000.' A newspaper might safely use the confession by changing the damaging phrase to read 'caused all my troubles,' instead of 'made me steal,' etc."

A libel case clearly illustrating the dangers of detective confessions is at the present moment in the New York courts. A woman was brought into Magistrate's court some time ago to be questioned in connection with an alleged jewel robbery. A private detective said she had confessed her guilt to him. But the Magistrate, after holding her a short time, released her. In the meantime, newspapers had published the story, playing up her alleged confession. One newspaper even published a picture of her with the private detective, captioning it as showing her in the act of confessing. After her release the woman sued for libel. She insists she never confessed; the detective insists she did.

"On the other hand," Mr. Helm continued, "a newspaper is perfectly safe in publishing a confession made to its own reporter, if the reporter, when he obtains the confession, gains permission for its publication. It is recognized by the courts that if the plaintiff consented to or authorized the publication of the libel complained of, he cannot recover for any injury sustained by reason of the publication he authorized."

In a recent story concerning the arrests of physicians, druggists and others alleged to have violated the prohibition law, a reporter made this assertion, which was subsequently killed, in regard to the arrangement of a woman doctor:

"The authorities say Dr. Blank was fined $300 for violation of the Harrison narcotic act some time ago and her license under the Harrison act revoked."

"Possibly this was true," Mr. Helm pointed out, "but, since it was not vital to the story there certainly was no need of printing it simply on the word of an anonymous plural authority. The reporter in a short time could have verified the assertion and written it boldly as a fact. The truth would have been satisfactory defense should libel litigation have followed."

"Lifting Libel With Your News" will be the title of the fourth article in this series to be published in Editor & Publisher next week. As in previous articles points of law will be illustrated by specific newspaper cases.

GENEVA MEETING OF PRESS EXPERTS ASSURED AS 25 NATIONS APPROVE

Preparatory Meetings to Assist League Secretary-General to Draw Up Agenda May Be Held in May and June—Many Subjects Suggested For Discussion

(By Mail to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

GENEVA, March 19.—The proposed convening of an international committee of press experts under the auspices of the League of Nations now seems assured.

Groups of newspaper men in more than 25 countries have signified approval of the enterprise.

No date has been set, but preparatory meetings may be held in May and June to assist the Secretary-General to prepare an agenda.

Replies received from groups of journalists over the world give a wide range of suggestions as to the scope of the conference. Many replies contain definite and technical proposals. Some are from press agencies and service associations, others from individual and associated newspaper proprietors and others from individual journalists.

In an official statement communicated to the Council of the League on March 15, M. Vandervelde said: "As the replies received are in favor of the summoning of a committee of press experts, I propose that you now decide that it should be summoned, and that you request the Secretary-General to prepare its agenda on the basis of the results of the inquiry that has been made.

"The final arrangements of the agenda appears to me a difficult problem, which cannot be solved without the co-operation of the parties concerned. The press representatives themselves might be asked to choose and define the questions to be discussed by the Committee of Experts. For this purpose the best method would perhaps be to hold at Geneva a few preparatory meetings of persons connected with the different sections of the press, such as directors of telegraph agencies, newspaper proprietors, heads of press bureaus, and journalists who are obliged by their profession to live or to travel frequently abroad.

"This second stage of the consultation will, I trust, lead to the preparation of a definite and practical programme of work. The composition of the Committee of Experts and the date of its meeting can be arranged afterwards, when this work has been finished. I need hardly point out that the question at issue is the summoning of a limited Committee of Experts and not a general press conference.

"I propose to my colleagues that they adopt this report and request the Secretary-General to take the necessary action."

Replies from journalists in various countries, in addition to those previously announced (see EDITOR & PUBLISHER for Dec. 12 and Jan. 16) were also made public by the Secretary-General. These follow:
